with agricultural laborers and regions. Towns were very particular days per week was bound peasants to their labor. The feudal system of landowners and lords was often associated with serfdom. The concept of a serf was based on the idea of a fief or a piece of land that was given to a vassal. This vassal would be responsible for administering justice, helping the lord in wars, and providing military service when needed.

The economic and social rights of serfs were limited, and they were often forced to work on the land of their landlord. This meant that they had minimal freedom and were bound to the land. The lords had control over the serfs, and they were able to exploit their labor. The lords were responsible for collecting taxes and rents from the serfs. The lords also had the power to control the serfs' lives, including their marriages, and they could strip them of their freedom if they did not comply with their obligations.

The serfs had no rights to move out of the area where they lived. They were bound to the land and could not leave the area without the permission of their lord. If they tried to leave, they could be punished with fines or even banishment. The lords could even fine them for not working on the land as required or for not paying their taxes. The lords could also fine them for not complying with their obligations.
