NET, and the entire Rhino family, continues to evolve. In this first post, we'll look at Grasshopper basics and quickly get started with the libraries we need to get started. On the Grasshopper website, there is a simple tutorial on how to get started with Grasshopper. With Rhino 6, we have a couple of exciting new features, which I'll highlight in this post. Imagine we have a project for the refurbishment of the New York Times building. We have a few architects and a lot of work to do. We make a few design decisions and we are ready to start construction. Instead of sending a large number of sheets of paper to our architects, we can now send them the documentation in Grasshopper and we'll work together to edit the documentation as needed. Now our design can be changed, on the fly, without having to get additional approvals. We can also easily send the documentation to other Rhino projects, because it's all in Grasshopper. Finally, we can then all work together from the Rhino and our Grasshopper-enabled Rhino projects, while onsite, to complete the project. The decision to build is made and we get to start. But we can't start construction until the building permits are approved. During this time, we have a few more design decisions to make. Now our documentation includes all of the plans, specifications, and other documents needed to approve our building permit. We need to get the approved building permit to start construction, but we need to wait for these things to be approved. During this time, we need to make more design changes, and we have to send all of the documentation and the building plans to our building permit authority for approval. This has to be done every time we make a change to the project. We can't change the design of the building, but we can make a few small changes to the construction schedule. We can change the time when we start the construction, but we can't do anything to prevent the construction from starting on time. After we get the building permit, we will be able to start construction. For our project, we are using a Grasshopper-enabled Rhino project. As part of the project, we 520fdb1ae7
