The basis of an informative speech is to present a topic to the audience and then to describe or explain it. It sounds pretty simple, but particular attention must be paid to selecting a topic, or the whole speech may not be well received. Informative speeches can easily get boring for an audience for several reasons. First, the speaker should be sure not to present a well-known topic, or the audience will quickly lose interest. The topic should be something that the audience has never experienced before, or at least contain new and exciting information on a familiar topic. Speakers should remember that their own interest will be visible during the presentation as they prepare the speech. In other words, if the speaker is bored of the subject, the audience will also get bored. Knowledge of the audience is a primary factor in the selection of an informative language topic. The speaker should take into account the age, knowledge, subculture and other demographics of his listeners when preparing the speech. It important to present information that is neither too elementary nor too difficult for the audience to understand. The chosen theme should reflect the interests of the audience and be fascinating to them without rehashing information they already know. For College students may be interested in a topic related to alcohol consumption, but they are already very familiar with a topic such as the dangers of drinking and driving. In this case, the speaker could focus on the health benefits of red wine. In this way, he has chosen a theme that interests the audience, but probably presents new information that his listeners will not bore. Finally, when selecting an informative topic, speakers should pay attention to deadlines. A topic should be dealt with so thoroughly that the audience feels as if most of the questions on this subject have been answered. On the other hand, a narrow time limit can prevent the speaker from adequately covering a very complicated subject. If time is limited, an issue that requires a long explanation should be avoided. The audience should leave an informative sense of speech as if they had gained new insights on a topic. It's good if they're interested in doing their own research to learn more about the subject, but they should never leave the presentation confused or unclear about what they've just heard.
