I'm a designer who has used AutoCAD for years. Recently I was given the opportunity to work with their Graphisoft product, and I have to say - I am delighted with their transition to WinForms. It's nothing like the lo-fi graphical interface you get in AutoCAD, and I can't stand it when someone digs into a text box in my application and tries to pull up a dialogue box when I need to display a dialog. I was impressed with how easy it was to create a new form, but it's even better than that. You can drop down from the top of the form as in WPF, and then drag down to create new child windows. I don't know of any other program that even comes close to the capabilities of AutoCAD's graphical user interface. ----- cageface This is definitely the best CAD interface I've ever used. I really can't imagine working without it. The only thing I think could be improved would be to add a modal dialog box feature. The only place where you really need a modal dialog to prevent an interruptive workflow is when you need to get user confirmation before deleting something. You could probably write this in a single line of code in this program but that's not something I'd expect from them. ~~~ buro9 Isn't that a general problem with CAD tools? They can sometimes be the killer feature, but they're not the killer feature, that you can kill the feature that is. Many people would have loved to have a new feature in AutoCAD, but are uninterested in building that feature. They are only interested in using AutoCAD for drawing, not for doing anything else. The designer might be interested in designing the next feature, but it is the CAD tool that is killing the feature. I'm not sure. I still feel like I'm missing something. All the controls are dead simple and they just work, no matter what you're doing. For example I'm working on a large 2D scene now and I want to put a text box on top of a 3D object. That's easy. No dice. With Balsamiq or FlashFlow the mouse only selects 520fdb1ae7
