Severe behavioral disturbances and early regressive phenomena in the course of cerebral malaria. Brief behavioral disturbances occur occasionally in the course of cerebral malaria. Their timing and severity are not well defined. To study the clinical course of cerebral malaria in relation to behavioral disturbances, we collected data on 125 consecutive cases of cerebral malaria during a 6-year period. We defined behavioral disturbances as those that could be measured by validated scores, ie, the Marburg Reaction Level Scale (MARS) and the Mental State Examination (MSE). In addition to the MARS and MSE, which were administered on admission, the series included two further assessments, one at discharge and the other within 5 days after discharge. The duration of acute febrile illness was significantly shorter among cases with behavioral disturbances than among those without ( $P=0.04$ ); similarly, the length of hospitalization was longer ( $P=0.02$ ). A significant trend was noted for the progression from behavioral disturbances to coma ( $P=0.001$ ). Severe behavioral disturbances were found in a total of 27 patients (21%), with a mean duration of  $1.9\pm 1.1$  days. They were characterized by somnolence, slow, irregular movements, and disturbed level of consciousness. In most cases, the disturbance was unilateral and did not involve other neurological symptoms, although focal neurological abnormalities were found. In one case, the disturbance lasted more than 2 weeks. Eleven cases (41%) of severe behavioral disturbances resolved during their hospital stay. Our results suggest that the manifestations of behavioral disturbances in cerebral malaria may be relatively short-lived, and that, in many cases, they resolve before coma.
