In my asp.net (3.5) web application I am using a JSESSIONID to keep track of a user's session. I've been given this advice from a 3rd party: With the new version of JSF, if you enable the javax.faces.CONFIG.jsessionid configuration parameter in your web application server, you can use this parameter in your web application to identify a client when using session cookies. Does this mean I need to set this parameter in the web.config or something in web.application? I have no idea what the hell it means! A: JSESSIONID cookie is stored in your browser session.
