This is because the disputed position is not really in the possession of a ship. Everyone has their own strengths and weaknesses, and the answer to what the best ship is really is on whichever ship you like to use the most. Whether it's the look or the way he maneuvers or how much jump range he has, everyone seems to have their own personal favorite. See on Steam | HTC Vive & Oculus RiftSee at Oculus | Oculus Rift The game's three most expensive ships, the Anaconda, the Federal Corvette and the Imperial Cutter, will almost always outperform lower-cost ships, but they're relatively unattainable until you've forged a name for yourself in Elite: Dangerous. In addition to the big three, there are many other ships to choose from. To help you decide which one can become your favorite, we've put together a list that highlights some ships and what they excel at. Best ship to combat ships generally have powerful weapons, thick armor, and are great at maneuvering. They excel in bounty hunting and generally blowing other boats out of space. When you start a career that involves fighting, you might want to grab a ship that is nimble and that can take a beating but doesn't cost much. If you make a mistake and happen to get yourself and your ship in trouble, you want to be able to replace it. In the role of budget combat ship best to boot, check out the Viper Mk IV. It has decent armor, can make a big leap, and only costs about 400,000 credits for a basic model. Some people will stick with the Viper Mk IV for their entire battle career, but others may want to upgrade. Vulture is one of the most agile ships out there. It has decent armor and shields, and will cost about five million credits before equipping your needs. If flexibility is high on your list, definitely check out this efficient ship that remains relatively low cost. Best ship for mining Most aspiring researchers seem to start their mining career in an Asp Explorer. It has a lot of interiors for your drone limpet controllers, it has decent cargo space for your haul, and jump jump It's high enough to take you where you're going. If things get hairy, he's got a lot of armor. Pilots looking for something that can bite back if some aggressive NPCs come to check out your operation might want to take a look at python. It has a ton of cargo space and is not quite as much of a sitting duck as the Explorer Asp. Best ship for marketing Type-7 Carrier seems to be a popular choice if you want a clean trading ship, but it is quite vulnerable to attack. For only about five million units more, you can get an Imperial Clipper that is much faster and will usually get you out of any jams with its speed alone. Keep in mind that Clipper is limited to large pillows. If you're looking for something that works with medium landing pads and outposts, the Python is a great choice with a ton of cargo space. It can also defend itself, and, if you decide to upgrade to a better trading ship in the future, you can retroactively turn the Python into a smuggler or combat ship. Best ship to explore For some players, the wide-open galaxy in Elite: Dangerous is too tempting not to explore. Those who are attracted to flying in every corner of the game are probably looking for a ship mostly dedicated to their purpose. The shortcut series is important here, so take a look at the Asp Explorer and Diamondback Explorer. The Asp Explorer has a wide open cockpit which is particularly nice, but it also costs about three times more than the Diamondback. If you're not sure you're an explorer by heart, or if you don't have Horizons, the Carrier is a cheap, shuttle-looking ship with a good jump range. It suffers from indoor space, but for starters it's a big ship. Best multipurpose ship Some pilots can't keep their fingers out of anything. They want to mine asteroids, they want to smuggle slaves, and they want to reach the far corners of the galaxy. This is not a problem if you don't mind having a fleet of ships, but some pilots connect to their steel hulls and want to stick with one at a time. In this case, you really need to look at price versus performance. If you're extremely wealthy and want something luxurious, the Imperial Cutter and the Federal Corvette can be equipped pretty much any way you want, but you need the military rank to unlock them. However, if you want to spend a little less and want to make less equipment, the Anaconda is probably your best all-around bet if you still want something luxurious. Again, in about a third price, you can't count out the powerful Python. No, it's not as big or as fancy as the Anaconda, but it's a ship you can buy relatively early in the game and stick with for your entire career, no matter what it entails if you choose it. Ship: Federal corvettePapo: PVE combatCoriolis Link: hereDesigned by: Down to Earth AstronomyDescription: D2EA of the fighting corvette build known as the cucumber. The construction works well regardless of your skills as a combat pilot. It can be used solo in both haz-res and conflict zones without any problems. Ship: AnacondaPurpose: PVE combatCoriolis Link: hereDesigned by: Down to Earth AstronomyDescription: A battle mounted Anaconda that requires no engineering and is easily able to run on haz-res sites. The build is designed for younger players, but with a price tag of 500 mil it's a bit on the expensive side. Ship: Alliance ChieftainPurpose: PVE Battle/Material CollectionCoriolis Link: hereDesigned from: Down to Earth AstronomyDescription: A Chieftain Alliance build using cryptoscramblers and pacifier frag cannons to get under large NPCs to collect materials. This is by no means the fastest way to collect materials, but it is much more fun than most other methods. And watching Anacondas blow up in 22 seconds never gets old :-)
