The subproject and investigator (PI) may have received primary funding from another NIH source, and thus could be represented in other CRISP entries. The institution listed is for the Center, which is not necessarily the institution for the investigator. [unreadable] [unreadable] This project focuses on the role of humanin (HN) protein in AD. HN is a pro-survival peptide that is decreased in AD, and was originally found in the brain. Recently we have cloned the cDNA encoding HN and shown that in addition to being produced in the brain, it is also expressed in placenta. Using our cell-based assays for HN, we are examining HN expression and processing in the same cells. Our initial experiments have shown that HN is cleaved by membrane-type metalloproteinases in a manner similar to the pro-BDNF, and that HN can act as an antagonist to ApoE-mediated cell death. We are also working on developing a HN-specific antibody to further explore the role of HN in AD. This work is funded through the Center's Developmental Core Grant.
