Back to the beginning of Learn French Basics: A French lesson for beginners Learning French pronunciation, French alphabet and French Accents French pronunciation is known to be confusing for non-native French speakers, especially when faced with a French word that looks nothing like it's pronounced from the way it's written (think snacks, for one). The French language is full of funky retrography and very specific pronunciations - silent letters, clusters of vowels and sounds that do not exist in English. Don't worry if you can't master the typical French accent or French pronunciation right away; It takes time and practice! The best way to remember these rules is to just practice over and over again, especially by reading the texts aloud. Watching French television and movies or listening to French podcasts, radio and film can certainly help you master French pronunciation and sound like a native French speaker. French Vocabulary Learning the French Dictionary is not as hard as you think. It takes time and practice, but you will find there are many French words and phrases that are related to expressions you already know. As mentioned above, French is a descendant of vulgar Latin, spoken by ordinary people of the Roman Empire. Although English is not in the same language family as French (English is Germanic), more than a quarter of English words come from Latin, and about the same number of English words come from French (so, indirectly from Latin). And there are thousands of Greek words that have made their way in English and French, too. This means that you will find many Latin and Greek words in the French dictionary you already recognize. When you see the French words artiste, acad'mique, or g'nration, for example, you probably won't have any trouble guessing their English equivalents. The basics of French grammar French verbs and the French verb Conjugation of The Verbs are key elements of any French Whenever you want to express that someone or something is doing some action or something something you need a French verb. You can find out when the word you come across is a French verb by noticing the ending of the word. French verbs end with one of three endings: -er (like the verb danser, dance), -ir (as avertir, warn) or -re (as perdre, lose). This makes it quite easy to find out when you are dealing with a French verb, as opposed to another type of French word like a French noun or a French adjective. However, these are only endings for verbs in their so-called infinitive form - do, be, eat or speak, for example. To be used in real French sentences, these verbs must be conjugated, which is a technical way of saying that each French verb requires a special ending depending on the subject of the verb (who or what makes the action of the verb). There are many French verbs that are considered regular because they all follow the same consistent pattern of conjugation. For example, for a conventional verb ending in -er, like a parler (speak), if the pronoun je (I) is the subject, or the one who does the talk, you drop -er the ending from the verb and add the ending -e to the remaining verb stem, giving je parle, or I say. For the pronoun of the tu (you), Parler becomes the wrong parles, or you speak. Each object has its own special conjugation, or the ending of the verb associated with it, and this applies to all verbs, regardless of whether they end in -er, -ir, or -re - although the conjugations are slightly different for each end. There are, however, many French verbs - and the important ones are that - whose conjugations are irregular and should be studied and memorized separately. These verbs include such as aller (go), Eet (be) and avoir (have). Knowing how to conjugate French verbs is essential in order to be able to express yourself in French, and you will probably spend most of your French learning journey focusing on the grammar of French verbs. Once you master them, you will be well on your way to speaking French with fluency. French nouns and French sex Every French noun has a gender, which means that it is classified as male (male) or female (feminin). This does not mean that every person, place, object or idea is inherently male or female; it is simply a system of grammatical categorization that exists in French and many other languages of the world, which affects how speakers use these languages. Often, French gender labeling cards words in the way you expect; La Mayor (mother) is a female noun, so it requires a special specific article la (), while le Per (father) is a male noun that requires a certain Le. But sometimes these gender assignments can be quite arbitrary; why la loungeur (chair) is feminine while le canape (sofa) is Much of the study of French nouns involves memorizing their gender classifications, so it is important to practice this concept. There are patterns of specific word endings that can tell you in which field they can be assigned; for example, nouns that end in -ence or -sion (e.g. la violence or la passion) or those that end in double consonants, followed by -e, like la femme (woman) or la tristesse (sadness), are often feminine. And if you see a word ending in -eau (e.g. le bateau, or boat) or in -eur (as in le moteur, or motor), chances are high that the French word is masculine. But be careful with words that challenge this model, like the male words le squelette (skeleton) or le silence (silence) or the female words la peau (skin) or la chaleur (heat). The gender of these words must also be remembered. French flooring can be a tricky concept to master for this reason and others! When discussing French nouns, we should also talk about French adjectives. The adjectives in French, or words describing the properties and characteristics of nouns, usually follow the noun in the sentence and must agree with the nouns they modify. This means that their endings must reflect the gender (male or female) and the number (single or plural) of the noun to which they belong. An adjective like chaudhity (hot) can change a singular, masculine noun like le plat (dish) to give us le plat chaud (hot dish). But if the noun is as feminine as la boisson (drink), we get the expression la boisson chaude (hot drink). If the nouns are plural, the adjective endings change to reflect this, usually by adding -S, and we get expressions like les plats chauds (hot dishes) and les boissons chaudes (hot drinks). There are many types of French adjectives whose endings have slightly different variations from this example, but the idea is the same - French adjectives should reflect the gender and number of nouns they describe. As in many world languages, such as Spanish, German and Italian, French distinguishes between two different ways of addressing someone you talk to - informal and formal you are. This aspect of linguistic French etiquette may be a little confusing for a native English speaker, but it is something that will become as second nature to you as you learn French because it appears so often. In French, the pronoun of that (you) is unofficial, the only second person's pronoun is reserved for when you're talking to one (and only one) person you know, know or with whom you are friendly, friendly, intimate or more or a higher social basis, such as when you're reaching out to friends, lovers, classmates, pets, co-workers or children. Pronoun vous (which is also also You are) reserved for more than one person - you can think of it as you all do. But vous also plays into French etiquette in that it's also a formal special form of address, which means that you use it when you talk to the only person who is in a position of respect or authority towards you, or someone you don't know very well and someone you want to be polite. This may include your boss, your professor, your relatives or elders in your family if you are young enough. Most people who are unsure whether to use this or that in conversation resort to vous at first so as not to seem impolite. Thus, in the rules of linguistic French etiquette, that is used only to address the individual in an informal sense, and vous is used in all other contexts - with more than one person and with one person in a more formal context. Both that and vous require their own special verb conjugations, so it is important to learn how, when and why you would like to distinguish them in the branch. Basic French phrases and French greetings to speak like a native French speaker, there are certain must-know French phrases and expressions that will help you navigate your way through conversation. The best place to start, of course, is with hello! There are many general greetings in French to choose from, the most popular of which are bonjour (literally good afternoon), or if it's around 6 or 7pm or later, bonsoir (Good evening). With people you know are familiar and personally, greeting! (Hi!) works well, too. Will you be familiar with major French phrases like Comment allez-Vous? (literally how do you do it?) or Comment you-tu? in more random contexts. Comment For va? (How does it happen?) Or just for va? also very popular. Could you suggest Bien, and Toi? (Well, and you?) or Tout va bien! (Everything is going well!) in response, but if you're not in high spirits, you can answer with Comme ci, comme for (How it's like it.) or Pas mal, which means not bad. If you're dating someone for the first time, you want to talk about who you are and maybe where you're from. To say your name, you can say Je m'appelle X, or I call myself X. You can also say Je suis X, or I X. To find out the names of other people, you can ask Comment tu t'appelles? (literally what do you call yourself?) or Comment vous appelez-vous? in more formal situations. Way to say where you come from in French Je suis de X (literally I X) or Je viens de X (I come from X), and ask where someone from, you can say D'o' viens-tu? or more formally D'o' venez-vous? To say goodbye in French, au revoir! is a classic go-to, and salut! will do the trick, too, in more informal situations. Th (See you soon!) is also a great great great and Bonn journr! (Good day!) and Bonn Souaire! (Good evening!), farewell equivalents bonjour and bonsoir. There are many other useful colloquial French words, phrases and expressions that you will learn as you learn French, from s'il vous plait and s'il te plat (please), merci (thank you) and de rien (you welcome) to Oz est X? (Where's the X?) and Parlez-vous anglais?, or do you speak English? When you learn these French phrases and hundreds more like them, you will be better able to communicate with native French speakers with ease. French tuition class is the most popular option for students in primary school or university settings. This allows for more intensive, regular learning with feedback from teachers who know French and can correct errors as they occur and teach content online. Depending on how big the class is and how busy the teacher is, learning in the classroom may be a less personalized experience, but having other students to talk and practice with is a valuable resource for a learner of any language. Although full-time students make up a significant proportion of French students, many adults also attend French lessons. Many and communities offer free or fairly cheap language courses and you will be very likely to find them in popular languages like French. While full-time work may limit your schedule, your schedule, Once or twice a week a French class after work or on weekends can really improve your French language skills in a measurable way. Learning French with a French tutor Private French tutoring offers a more individual learning experience than traditional classroom learning with many benefits. Having an experienced French teacher on hand who can help you improve your pronunciation and work closely with you on aspects of the French language that cause you problems is a great way to improve your skills quickly - without teachers having to split time and attention between multiple students. And French tutoring should not be uncomfortable at all; many sessions can and do happen by video link, not in person. But often the steep cost of such individual training can be an obstacle for many students. Well-trained masters of French tutors often charge high hourly rates for their lessons, so finding a high-quality, budget option can be challenging. Most of the content that is found in apps such as Duolingo and Memrise or scattered all over the Internet comes from user translations that are rarely verified and often incompatible or riddled with errors. These lessons often focus on writing and reading without much way to improve listening and speaking skills. Be careful that free interactive French lessons like this can often be basic, poorly designed, dirty, hard, and just totally boring - not to mention littered with ads. This does not mean that these French resources cannot be useful! But it is important to know how and where to fill in your journey to learn the language when certain content is not enough. Learning French with native Speakers tandem learning is a method where two people who speak different native languages meet to help each other learn, changing roles as a teacher and student. For example, if you spend one hour teaching a friend who is French or a native French speaker something about English, he or she will spend the next hour teaching French for you. This is an effective method where both people are able to devote considerable time and thought to partnership, but keep in mind that not every good teacher. Explaining why your native language works the way it often is easier said than done; You can understand English grammar subconsciously and use it flawlessly all the time, but not be able to explain to a French person or a French speaker the rules that govern how you should use that grammar. But no doubt immersing yourself in a new culture and place that doesn't speak your language and surrounding yourself with the French people or other French speakers will make you make rapid progress in your target language as you struggle to communicate and understand those around you.
