

Human Fulfillment for All

CH 1

First and foremost, we must develop a clear vision of what we ultimately want to achieve and a powerful commitment to the values that are a part of that vision.

This is where the revolution begins.

The revolution begins in the minds of the people.

Yes, we have very real laws, policies, and rules that bring a well defined shape to most all of what we do. However, the structures created by our society's countless organizations are ultimately created through the will of human beings. These structures are not cemented, they are not immovable. They exist through the agreement of human beings to respect and follow their rules. Their continuing life ultimately comes down to human decision.

If we want to transform our society we must decide to live our lives by new rules.

And we must organize with others to remake the rules of the organizations that impact our lives.

CH 2

But we do not solely want change, we want improvement.

Ultimately, we want to live in the best society possible.

But what does that mean?

This is precisely where vision and purpose become essential.

What is the purpose most worthy of pursuing and what is the vision of what it will look like?

CH3

As human beings, there is nothing greater to achieve than a life of fulfillment.

As a society, there is nothing greater to achieve than human fulfillment for all of our people.

CH4

Right now we are far from the ideal of human fulfillment for all.

Our dominant values, thinking, and structures are incompatible with this ideal.

And so the task is to describe the vision of the society of human fulfillment, educate the people about this vision and how it can be achieved, and organize the people into a social movement that will bring forth this vision.

This is the cultural revolution.

CH5

Because so much of society, so much of our lives, is shaped through organizations, reforms to these structures is essential.

The conventional organization in our society (whether business, non-profit, or governmental) operates through a deeply flawed logic. The narrow objective of the organization (however worthy it may be) is the only objective. Consequently, all members of the organization come to be viewed as no more than means of production. All by-products of operation become irrelevant, regardless of the magnitude of their effect on the world.

This myopic thinking at the heart of our organizations is what must be transformed.

It must be replaced with a wholistic approach that brings equal consideration to three purposes: the fulfillment of the organization's members, the organization's overall benefit to society, and the accomplishment of the organization's mission.

Organizations exist to allow people to come together to achieve goals that can only be accomplished collectively. But our own lives are not put on pause during our organizational activities: we continue living. And the quality of our lived experience does not become any less important during the time we are serving our organizational role. Yet, when you observe a conventional organization in action, it is as if the organizational members' lives have been put on pause. This is a gross violation of the dignity of humanhood; and we must shift the thinking behind it.

This is the cultural revolution.

CH 6

By coming together with a clear vision of the problem and of the solution, of the highest values to uphold, and of the ultimate outcome we are pursuing . . . we will achieve an unprecedented transformation on this planet.

Our brothers and sisters have been suffering terribly under the false idols of power, status, and money.

We must bring this heartbreaking era to an end and unleash humanity's rightful guide: the spirit of human fulfillment.

Together we can bring light where darkness has thrived. Together we can bring justice where injustice has ruled. Together we can bring dignity where disrespect has dominated.

Together we can build the world we all deserve.

This is the cultural revolution.

And it begins when you decide to unleash it.
