Good for all game levels Available in many sharp maneuverability design variants A little on the heavier side Buying guide for the best sub 3000 badminton racket Here are some of the key factors that you should consider while buying the best badminton racket for yourself. Badminton Skills Racket Balance Racquet Balance means the same as the weight distribution of the racket. Badminton rackets are classified at their equilibrium point, and are heavy on the head, lighthouse, and even balanced. Heavy head rackets are good for advanced players as it helps in the execution of powerful breaks. Lighthouse rackets aim for maneuverability and speed. Facilitates fast movements. As the name suggests, even balanced rackets have weight distributed evenly across the racket and gives a balance between power, control and speed. It provides flexibility and is recommended for beginners. Go for a balance of rackets that suits your style and skills. Flexibility The shaft of a badminton racket is rigid or flexible. Flexible axes provide more power but less control. It gives easy access to defend breaks and is considered good for beginners. Stiffer axes provide maximum control, but need stronger swings; that's why it's good for players who have advanced level knowledge and refined techniques. Ropes Badminton racket strings can also be considered as an important factor for many players. If you know your level playing field, then you should consider rope tension before buying a racket. Greater rope tension will lead to a smaller sweet spot. This would help put more strength in the shot. FREQUENTLY ASKED QUESTIONS 1) Which badminton racket is good for regular players? 2) Why is badminton racket weight one of the important factors? Badminton rackets are skipped in weight categories and are usually denoted as U. It is advisable to go for a racket that suits your badminton skills and technique. Beginners can go for a racket that is light or balanced as it would provide an equal amount of power and control and let the player maneuver easily. Heavier badminton rackets are ideal for professional players who have refined techniques and hit powerful weights. 3) What is the flexibility of a badminton racket? A badminton racket that has a flexible axis allows a player more power and maintains control and speed. Flexible badminton rackets are good for beginners or entry-level players. On the other hand, snowshoes with a rigid axis are good for advanced badminton or experts, as they help with the execution of powerful features with technique and precision.
