Bloomberg says the Walton family – owners of a little-known behemoth called Walmart and heirs to a fortune worth nearly $235 billion – have been secretly accumulating $5 billion worth of stocks through a family-owned firm.

Although much of this stock fortune is invested in exchanged traded funds (ETFs), our research shows that the family owns stock in individual companies too.

One stock is an e-commerce platform based in China that offers a wide range of products from groceries to appliances.

Another stock is a global investment manager that raises, invests, and manages credit for institutional and individual investors.

But a third stock stands out above them all.

This stock is remarkable not only because it’s disrupting data warehousing by giving clients the ability to get more value from the data they collect…

Or because the fact that it’s so popular that revenue has climbed more than sevenfold in just over two years…

Or because that nearly 212 members of the Fortune 500 are clients….

But also because our analysts note, that this stock – one in which the Walton dynasty owns in its $5 billion stock portfolio….

Also happens to be one of The Motley Fool’s hottest stock recommendations!

In fact, this stock is so hot that within the last four months, we’ve recommended it in six services – including Stock Advisor.

Which is why if you’re an investor looking to add a stock to your growing portfolio – you might want to consider this one.

You see, companies collect massive amounts of data about their customers and industries in hopes of putting it to good use. But they struggle to analyze the data effectively.

This company we're recommending makes it easy for other companies to analyze their cloud-based data with its accessible graphical user interface.

With nearly 5,000 businesses flocking to this company's data warehousing platform, and with more than two-fifths of the Fortune 500 as clients to date, we think this stock has the potential to continue its meteoric rise for years to come.

Especially since the company expects cloud spending to more than triple by 2025.

And here’s the thing.

When you dig into this stock a little deeper, you understand why it’s growing the way it is.

You see, even though this stock has been a huge success with revenue reaching $851 million over the past 12 months…

Experts estimate that database management and platform spending will eventually reach $100 billion.

Which means this stock may have only tapped into less than 1% of its total market opportunity!

And as growth investors, this is music to our ears.

Here’s a stock that’s still in the batter’s box in terms of growth…

In a growing cloud-based market that’s expected to reach $100 billion in less than four years…

And it’s recommended in six of our services...

Not to mention the confidence of knowing that the richest family in the world is also investing in it!

Why wouldn’t we want to buy this stock right now?
