What's inside? Check out our notes here. But, as we have mentioned before, it also includes a new tool, usbcpc, which is intended to provide basic USB boot support. What is usbcpc? usbcpc is a simple tool intended to be used with a Linux kernel to provide USB boot support. It provides two basic functions: Take a USB drive image file and build a kernel image for it, Take a kernel image and build a USB drive image for it. It is useful for several reasons: It works out of the box, without any configuration, on any machine. It will use the machine's bootloader to perform the USB device detection, which is usually the way how Linux boot support is provided. The only problem with this is that, by default, Linux doesn't use a bootloader and you may need to configure your machine's bootloader to boot from USB. If you don't need the bootloader, you can simply create a bootable USB drive by dragging the usbcpc tool to the ISO image of the root filesystem of your Linux distribution. It works on Windows and Mac. It will ask the user for the path to the kernel image and the USB drive image, which is done by the Windows Explorer, Finder and any other tool that can provide this information. It will then use the Windows Boot Manager to build a kernel image for it and, when all is done, it will ask the user for a USB drive image. The current version of usbcpc is very basic, but it is intended to be extended to support more USB devices, e.g. it doesn't support multipath support for a mirror raid setup.
