The electronic service tool is available for sale through licensed technology centers and retail facilities. There are no government subsidies for sale of ETSs. Since the ETS is sold through Technology Centers, the cost is much higher than the retail price. ETS licensing and its availability for sale through retail facilities varies from product to product and is determined by individual companies. The cost for ETS licensing varies from manufacturer to manufacturer and can vary significantly. When it comes to the availability of ETSs on government facilities, most government facilities have a policy of free and open access to the public. The availability of ETSs on government facilities will vary. Some agencies do not provide ETSs at all while some facilities may charge a nominal fee for the license. The aforementioned issues and complexities in ETS licensing are based on third-party ETS licensing agencies like IPONWEB and ETS manufacturers like AT&T. It's a philosophy that I suspect is as old as architecture itself. Students at Western State have always had a competition for the ideal dorm room (my brother and I submitted entries. . . Continue reading AFRO-LITO on Design Competitions, Badly-Ascribed Thinking about my next great article, I was struck by the irony of it being about the Bay Bridge. I was in a meeting today with some other teachers and staff at Western State, and the conversation inevitably turned to "How can we make a career in education?" I know that it is hard to stay motivated... Continue reading Thoughts on Teaching at Western State I've been toying with the idea of contributing a monthly article on Western State for a long time now, and I finally decided to go for it.
