Paul Cobin's divorce from his wife of more than 35 years is being finalized. The fight that led to the quickie divorce began with a disagreement over who was to take a late-night shower.

Diane Cobin filed for divorce in August after arguing that her husband, Paul, 56, failed to pay family expenses, as well as monthly mortgage payments and property taxes. However, sources told the Post that the divorce may have stemmed from more than financial issues. In May, the Seattle Times reported that the divorcing couple had a confrontation at his pharmacy workplace in the early hours of the day. Cobin left that evening and went home. He has maintained that he and his wife, Diane, are in the process of working out their differences, and that the incident was not part of the divorce. Their attorney, Steve Hartt, disputes that characterization. Hartt also disputes that Diane Cobin can, as her divorce attorney, turn in their children and say

"We want our house back." But his client is adamant, saying, "I will not allow my children to be removed from our home."

Diane Cobin says she has been in the same house for nearly two decades and has no plans to move. Hartt said his client will maintain ownership of the house, which she purchased in In his divorce documents, Cobin requests that his and Diane Cobin's marital home in the Sammamish neighborhood be listed for sale. He's the self-appointed, gourmet event planner — and he says his customers are always willing to contribute to the cause. Kitty Calvin spends her time in a well-appointed home in Redmond. The infidelity began when she was undergoing a divorce after her husband had an affair with a female bartender. He asked her to lie to the court, she said. She did, and found herself all alone. From there, her emotional life fell apart. She ended up in a mental health facility for a time, 520fdb1ae7
