Traders may be mistaken for giving up gold and silver and could lose potentially stable profits on those metals. Do people spend the remaining weeks of the year? Maybe they don't want to push their bets? Slightly changed on Wednesday as chop-fest continued, but here's what I see happening with volatility. We have a mispriced asset opportunity in gold and silver. We have other things to consider: width, emotions, new uphills, and don't tell on talking heads TV, honey. Bitcoin is still a market that people would rather talk about than trade, but 2020 profits are more legal than in 2020 Everyone wants to chase everything that hasn't moved yet, but they don't know why. Two big shocks on Monday: We saw a bit of a commotion about GLD's bill and the tingly VIX move. Gold and silver can be boring compared to But could it be that the forgotten could be next to break higher? Ideas on copper, precious metals and S&amp;P, as well as a low-risk way to get involved in a possible recovery in inventories. Market winners and losers. Intel loses touch and a high-risk/high-reward scenario for two major ETFs. At the moment, there are several ways to play this. I'm looking for love in all those places where these are lagging behind are the shares. The idea of strength remains well rooted in the charts of the S&amp;P 500, Gold, Nasdaq 100 and Russell 2000. There is a long and fast-growing list of many of the world's wealthiest investors eagerly buying gold and gold shares right now. If inflation doesn't translate into a higher yield for the Treasury, here it will show up and what you will do to benefit from it. As gold and silver tick ever lower, investors eagerly look at their charts to give them a hint that will never happen. Here's a play I've unearthed from the VanEck Vectors Gold Miners Fund. In a time of economic or political compulsions, commodity meetings are often all or nothing. Here's a trade idea. It may be a good time to buy the KGC with this return to strength. The gold rally is still in its early stages. The maps say stay with it for the long run. With a $6 billion Japanese contract, Buffett, now 90, hasn't stayed away from outside america. If you want to look for a new purchase in Netflix, here are a few buyback zones to watch; Let's also take a look at GLD's weekly and daily charts. Let's take a look at Barrick Gold's listings after Warren Buffett invests in the company. The market may be fine until either growth or inflation forces the Fed to change its interest rate guidance. Good stock collection continues as market participants eliminate a number of negatives. The dips we see may not buy opportunities at all... So be careful. It's understandable why precious metals are in fashion in our Covid-19 world, but keep in place that their prices can turn 10 cents. Although today is only December 31, 2010, I call this my first call in 2011 – DON'T BUY GOLD!!! I've done regular reading and I've read six or seven different posts about why gold is great, and why now is the time to buy gold (actually there was one in silver, but it's the same thing - DON'T BUY SILVER!). Look, there is no doubt that gold can and is likely to continue to grow in the short term – as long as there is a huge fear of inflation in the future. But gold goes back down, it always goes, and it might not go as low as it once was (because it's a limited resource), but it goes back down. Why don't I invest in Gold?Here are some of the things that bother me a lot about gold:it's purely speculative – the only thing, gold has what it's got to back up, no matter what People are willing to pay for it. There's no income, no property, just the metal itself. Yes, there are companies that use it, but they pay for it just as the individual pays for it. If you buy gold, you only buy it in the hope that it will raise the price (unless you believe doomsday is coming and hard funds have to be spent on lymphasy... most likely not to happen... never...) Everyone talks about it – a sure sign of a wealth bubble is when everyone talks about it. Like I said before, I've read about gold everywhere. Plus, it's all over the news, you can see it on CNBC, everywhere. This suggests a huge bubble! Look at the charts in the last bubble! We are close to this kind of speculation. Look what happened a year later. It's up to you. Institutions do NOT buy gold. If you look at the institutional ownership of GLD (see below), institutions do not even own half of the assets. This shows that it is driven up by people who want to take advantage of the ride. Most funds and shares push more than 70% of institutional ownership. If the big banks don't believe it, should you? They usually know what happens before the audience. Finally, gold pays no dividend. You spend your hard-earned capital on this stuff and it doesn't cost anything. And if you buy it from the fund. If you buy real gold, there are all kinds of costs – you have to pay a premium per ounce, you need to store the goods (safe, safe, broker, etc.), you need to find a buyer. Why not invest in a solid dividend-paying stock? Now I'm not saying it's time to sell gold. It can still go higher. But I don't think investors should buy more gold, and if they have a position in it, they should be watching closely for a price cut. Readers, what do you think about buying gold? Consumers should be wary of claims that customers can make a lot of money on these or any investment with little risk. As with all investments, you can lose money, and past performance is no guarantee of future results. Consumers should also have a clear idea of investment-related charges before agreeing to invest. Whether you're looking for a long-term investment or just want something concrete that you can sell quickly in the event of another economic crisis, some saw buying gold as a proven method to ensure financial security. We interviewed Don Durrett, a long-term investor and author of the book How to Invest in Gold and Silver, to help answer the five most common questions about buying gold. As with any investment, the buy-low, sell-high rule applies to gold in either coins, bulls or stock form. If you want to know the right time to buy, explore the gold you want to buy and keep an eye on the market. Because gold tends to perform well when the economy is in recession, most people buy gold as financial insurance to hedge their bets on the value of the dollar in the market. Gold, as a hard asset, also holds its value during inflation. For example, the early 1970s would have been a great year to buy gold - its value rose from $35 an ounce in 1971 to $180 an ounce in 1974. There are two main reasons why people buy gold: as insurance and as an investment. People who are concerned about the recent economic crisis tend to regard the ownership of precious metals as insurance. As long as you have physical gold or silver for sale or trade, you will never be broke even if the economy collapses. Buying a gold bar is easy, and when you buy it, all you have to do is it. Bullion bars and bars are a relatively safe way to buy gold, although some investors prefer to invest in gold-focused mutual funds or exchange-traded funds (ETFs). For example, golden IAs are a kind of investment retirement account backed by gold. They work in the same way as a traditional or Roth IRA, but they have bulls or coins instead of paper assets. For more information, explore how to find the best golden IRA company. Other ways to buy gold include:Gold Coins Two of the most straightforward coins to buy and sell are Canada's Maple Leaf and American Eagle gold bars. Maple Leaf, a 22-carat Canadian company, typically sells well in countries outside the United States, while the 24-carat American Eagle bullion coin often sells well in the United States. Other common bullion coins include the South African krugerrand produced by Rand Refinery and the South African Mint and Australia's gold kangaroo coins from Perth Mint.Gold jewellery in general, jewellery is not a lucrative form of investment. Retailers add up to 400% label gold jewellery, so it's unlikely you can get your investment back or earn money on top of that later. It's possible to find valuable gold jewellery in real estate sales or antique shows that don't have an added entry, but this is time consuming and only works if you really know what to look for. Gold mining sharesMining shares are another popular form of gold investment and can be lucrative. Instead of owning only a piece of gold, shareholders own a stake in the gold mining process by investing in mine-owning companies. Gold stocks are a riskier, potentially high-yielding investment. Buying a gold bar vs. mining shares While many people want to be a tangible commodity, such as a gold bar or jewellery, investing in mining shares can be a more lucrative investment opportunity that sometimes leads to greater wealth. Investing in mining stocks is riskier than buying physical gold bars or coins, but bribes can be more significant and include dividends that you don't receive when you buy gold. According to Durrett, mining shares are potentially a lifetime opportunity investment due to cash flow. Still, this option may not be for everyone. In our interview, Durrett described mining equity investors as confrontational and speculative. He also said that a successful investor would pay attention to their specific mining stocks for day-to-day and external factors such as oil prices, geological events and natural disasters that can affect the price of gold. Because of the risk, some investors recommend starting small ones: Investors really want to start using the money they can afford to lose until understand how mining stocks operate and, according to Durrett, cause their prices to rise and fall. It takes at least a year to get a little level of comfort [and] understanding of what they're doing, he said. There are a lot of unknowns, but over time you can understand what makes a mining company strong. You can control it completely; if something crazy happens in the world, you still have your gold bars. — Hunter Riley III One of the benefits of investing in mining shares rather than physical gold is that it is easier to sell. When you have physical gold, you need to find a physical buyer, which can be difficult and time-consuming, especially when the market starts to go south. Instead, selling shares is as easy as clicking on a few keystrokes. Although Durrett invests in mining shares, he recommends that people start investing in gold bars before jumping on stocks: I always tell people to buy physical gold or silver coins — buy them and push them into a safe deposit box and see how it feels. Hunter Riley III, a longtime investor and author of Stack Silver Get Gold: How to Buy Gold and Silver Bullion Without Get Re ripped Off, said that one of the most important things a gold bullion has done is that it's a tangible asset that you keep under your control, no matter what happens to the global economy. In his book Durrett writes: If you just want to maintain your wealth, then bullion is the place to invest. Durrett also highlights the risks associated with investing in mining shares, saying: You never think mining stocks are not a risky investment. He explains that anything can go wrong, including political events, geological events, flood events, currency situations or new tax rules. You never know what you can blind. The current price of gold is called spot price and varies constantly. The spot price reflects the latest average offer price, according to global professional traders. A number of things can affect the spot price on any given day, including war, central bank, supply and demand, and the size of the average transaction. When you buy gold, you buy by a percentage (usually 5-8%) above the spot price, and you sell at exactly the spot price. Supply and demand: As with other commodities, increased demand is pushing up the price of gold. Similarly, when supply is high and demand is low, gold prices fall. Inflation: The price of gold typically correlates inversely with the value of the dollar. When the value of the dollar falls, the price of gold rises. Seasonality: James Fraser and Kevin Pederson, authors of the book The Mining Stocks Investor Guide, recommend investors stick to the old saying to sell in May and go away when the summer months are set and prices tend to level off. By volumes will pick up and continue to grow until October and November. December may fluctuate, and the market is heavily dependent on the profits made by investors throughout the year. Mint: It may seem that buying ordinary coin mints would yield a lower return than rarer mints. However, the advantage is that you can easily sell one of these most popular coin mints when you need cash. Country of origin: According to Fraser and Pederson, first of all, you want to determine which region of the world the project is in and avoid areas of the world with political and social unrest, suspicious law enforcement, confiscation royal thought diseases, nationalisation rumors and high taxation. Oil prices: According to Durrett, companies focused on Mexico and South America have low price structures, but high energy costs that can affect the outcome. Management: Fraser and Pederson advise investors to always remember that the number one goal of the management team should be to maximize shareholder value. Durrett also advises investors to pay attention to the websites of management companies and consider it as a red flag if the management company doesn't send newsletters and update its website with market trends and news. In his book How to Buy and Sell Gold and Silver privately, Internet marketer and business coach Doyle Shuler explains many of the complex issues of taxation and gold buying. Some Läns apply sales tax on gold and others do not. Many gold buyers criticise the US government and therefore do not want their gold purchases to be recorded with the IRS. Shuler says just paying cash isn't enough to keep you out of the game. By law, precious metal dealers are required to report purchase amounts of more than $10,000 to the IRS. However, they only report the amount of money spent per transaction, not what was purchased or who bought it. Shuler recommends paying by bank transfer or checking if you buy more than $10,000 worth of gold in cash because banks don't report to the IRS. Gold bars are sold as bars or coins. Gold can be purchased online, as well as from local gold dealers, pawnshops and jewellery stores. Here are a few things to think about before buying physical gold:Check current gold spot prices You should keep track of the gold price for a while before deciding it's the right time to invest. You don't want to buy on peaks, so you need to understand what factors affect the price of gold. Gold coin-dealers, for example, argue that numismatic coins are worth more than just the metal inside them, which allows them to justify charging a premium when buying. You really can't get around this, so be careful with any retailers who claim that, they don't charge a fee. Shop around retailers' websites to make sure you pay a fair price for gold. Check exchange sites exchange sites what is the spot price of gold. It is advisable to pay a premium of 5-8% above the spot price for the gold coin. Find the right gold merchantDurrett advises gold bullion buyers to buy from online businesses and sell locally, explaining that local retailers can't compete with online stores and tend to charge customers more. But since you always sell your gold at a spot price, it doesn't matter where you sell. Explore reputable gold dealers to find a fair price for gold coins. In general, avoid buying gold online through promotional sites, as you can end up in a bidding war and pay more for a gold coin than it is worth. Here are a few things to consider when looking for a gold merchant:Reseller buyback policies: Before you buy from a gold merchant, explore their buyback policies. Some retailers charge a premium for selling gold, while others do not add an additional fee. Get the buyback policy in writing and keep it in a safe place for the future. Reputation: Buying everything online poses risks, so be sure to do a thorough investigation before deciding on a reseller. The U.S. Mint's list of gold dealers is a good place to start. While these dealers are not affiliated with the U.S. Mint, the Mint has checked that the retailers they advertise are trustworthy. Reading reviews on ConsumerAffairs is a useful way to find out which gold dealer is right for you. Consider storage options Where do you store your precious metals? Bank safe deposit boxes are an option, but many precious metal investors do not trust banks. You may want to buy a home safe for your gold, which increases the total cost of your investment. Keep in mind that home insurance may not cover the loss or theft of gold, so this can also affect where and how you store your bulls. Tips to avoid gold scams Although it's relatively easy to find and buy a bull, there are some risks to consider and look at before you jump on your purchase. When buying gold, there are certain places and people like Craigslist, online retailers offering huge discounts, pawnshops, TV ads, cold callers and all retailers that don't have a brick-and-mortar location because there's no way to make sure the retailer actually exists. Don't give in to the pressures of late-night telemarketers demanding that you call them frequently for a limited time at a discounted price for gold. Find a reputable dealer. Buying gold is usually a good investment strategy, but there are some red flags to consider when buying a retailer. Retailers offering free storage or delayed delivery may not be legal and I may never see the gold you paid for. gold in your own safe deposit box to reduce your likelihood of being exploited. Evidence coins: Avoid buying evidence coins you're using gold as an investment. In a special case, evidence coins are usually special coins fine-tuned to look more attractive than the usual coins currently in circulation. While these coins have a higher value for collectors, their monetary value certainly does not stay in the long run, making them a bad choice for investors. Fractional coins: Coins are available in different fractions, including half an ounce, a quarter ounce, up to the twentieth ounce. You better buy a full ounce, because fractions have a higher premium. Its value has historically been relatively stable and tends to perform better when stocks are falling. For these reasons, gold is a popular investment strategy for many people who want to diversify their portfolios.
