Real World articles (written in terms of production) First Star Trek: Ships line calendar, 2001 Star Trek: Ships line the Star Trek calendar series that began production in 2000 in 2001. They have starships of all eras, as well as ships created specifically for calendars. The format is in unusual horizontal alignment, with a two-page distribution of the image and has been used for all editions except the 2002 calendar. Calendars were jointly published by Pocket Books and Andrews McMeel Publishing until 2012, when their calendar publications were taken over by the Italian publishing house Rizzoli International Publications, which continued its publications under the imprint of Universe Publishing. The calendar series originated as the brainchild of Adam Lebowitz at a time when he and his team were working on the Utopia Planitia Fleet Yards sequence for VOY: Relativity at Foundation Imaging. As he put it: In fact, all the time we worked on the episode, we thought it was a shame that the people of the house would only see this stuff on blurry TV screens, not the high-resolution fame we created them in (Star Trek: Magazine Volume 2, Issue 9, p. 102) What Lebowitz had in mind was to produce a coffee table book filled with high resolution. , high glitter CGI images based on existing live action produced by CGI models are actually used for Star Trek productions. With the help of Robert Bonchun, he produced a portfolio of images he envisioned to clarify his intentions of the then editor-in-chief of Pocket Books, Margaret Clark. Clarke, not convinced of the viability of such a book, is the heels of the grim performance also conceived of the book Star Trek: Action! (Project Clarke herself) and New Worlds, New Civilizations, have proposed a calendar format instead as a test for the book, which will potentially be released later. Unfortunately, the book, which was to be called Star Trek: Invisible Frontiers declassified images from the history of the Federation, never succeeded due to the failure of the second edition in the series, despite the overwhelming success of the first. A much less ambitious book, titled Ships of the Line, was published in 2006 for the 40th anniversary of Star Trek, which collected images from all calendars except 2002 with a brief description of each of them by Mike Okuda. An extended second edition, in the same format as for the first edition, followed suit in 2014. In 2015, a book with Posters Star Trek: Ships of the Line Posters was published, containing more images from calendars. The first calendar was, as expected, filled with images using actual CGI models used for productions, as well as later editions, although, starting from the second calendar, original works of art (supplemented by non-canonical ships in later editions), CGI and otherwise, were also inserted. The 2013 edition was the last edition to be printed under an Pocket Books umbrella, according to Doug Drexler's Facebook page, suggesting it was to be the last. However, the 2014 edition was released by Universe Publishing, as the company took over the rights to the joint edition of Pocket Books in 2012. Calendars prepared by Note: If a particular image may be related to an event depicted in any of the transferred or printed Production of Star Trek, this is thus noted in brackets; otherwise they were originally conceived unrelated to the images. However, none of the images featured in calendars or in their book derivatives are considered canonical. 2000s 2010s 2020s Star Trek: Ships Line (2020) Star Trek (2021) 79 Products Sort Recommended Best Sales in Alphabetical Order, A-I in alphabetical order, Price, low to high price, high to low date, old to new date, new for an old real world article (written in terms of production) Doug Drexler and Margaret Clark Pocket Books (1st edition) Gallery Books (2nd edition) 7 November 2006 (1st edition) October 28, 2014 (2nd edition) Edition) 184 (1st edition)336 (2nd edition) You can search for Star Trek: Ships Line or Ship Line. The Ships Line is a hardcover guide that collects images of Star Trek: Ships of the Line calendars and Star Trek: Deep Space Nine 2001 Calendar, accompanied by captions written by Michael Okuda from an intra-tape point of view. While many of the illustrations and accompanying signatures relate to the events established in the canon, many others do not, and the work as such, like its original publications, is considered non-canonical. Summary of the inner jacket of the book (first edition) They dared to venture all this into a squiff cane or leather, on a ship of wood or steel, knowing that the only thing between them and the exact death was their ship. To explore, to look for something that lay outside of the near and comfortable, each researcher had to accept the danger. And when they did, there was a mystical connection, a passion for the ships that carried them. With The first time people dared to warp the fabric of space to escape the ashes of World War III, they also created ships. These vessels have become icons of humanity's desire to rise above the everyday, seek and Known. And these ships, which travel on the star seas, inflame the same passions as those that sailed in the oceans. Although each captain wished that their spaceship could be equipped in the same way as the sailboat H.M.S. Beagle - without weapons - which turned out to be untenable. From the outset, Starfleet realized that every vessel, due to the limited range of early warp engines, should be able to stand alone against any attack. So there was an idea, taken from the days of wooden sailing ships, that every Starfleet vessel should stand as a linear ship. Thanks to the actions of their captains and crews, countless starships have taken on this role. Here we remember some of these ships and their heroic crews. In honor of the fortieth anniversary of Star Trek, here for the first time are collected together impressive images from the highly successful and famous Star Trek: Ships line calendars. Gloriously rendered, each of these illustrations was created exclusively for pocket books. With a text by Michael Okuda (Star Trek Encyclopedia) about life about each of these valiant starships. Excerpts from copyrighted sources are included only for review purposes, without any intent to breach. Background First edition of the book was released to mark the 40th anniversary of Star Trek. It has most of the images from the calendars 2001-2006 (in 2002 calendar images were not included), although cropped in the form of a book. The book is a shot from the undeveloped Star Trek: The Unseen Frontier - declassified images from the Project History federation, which itself is the progenitor of the Series of Ships of the Line-Calendar. Editor and author Doug Drexler noted that, according to the editor of the publishing house Margaret Clark, the first printing of the book sold out in four days. This somewhat belied her earlier score for frontier unseen, which she decided to cancel five years earlier, believing the project to be economically unviable. The second edition of the book was released in October 2014 and updated to include images taken for calendars 2007-2014, adding 75 new images. It was also first available in e-book formats. However, this edition also left several images that were included in the first edition, while some others received new titles. For specific specifics, see individual calendar entries. Both editions, measuring 11×7 inches in a reclining format, were made in hardcover books with dust vests, featuring wrap-around illustrations for the first edition. The jacket illustrations were connected by Doug Drexler, who, besides being their editor-in-chief, also contributed significantly to the calendar series, and thus both books. [2] (X).
