A: It could mean either "Shut up, I can't hear a word you're saying." or "I'll beat you up if you don't shut up, I can't hear a word you're saying." In the latter case it's expressing a threat, so it might be used in combination with "punch". You could be talking about this, if you are talking to a robot (or animal). It could mean "I'll beat you up if you don't shut up, I can't hear a word you're saying." In particular, there is a slang term for this from the late 1980s to the mid 1990s, where it was used as a threat of physical violence. I don't know the origin of this, and I can't even remember if it was common in Toronto at the time, but I do remember that it was common in the inner-city suburbs and north Toronto in the 1990s. Like @jrista, I do know that it was commonly used by young white men, but I'm not sure what the stereotypical setting for this was. Inhibitory effect of cyclosporin A on the aggregation of monocyte-derived dendritic cells with T cells. T-cell activation requires several co-stimulatory and co-inhibitory molecules. One of the key molecules in inhibiting T-cell activation is programmed death-1 (PD-1), which is a receptor expressed on the cell surface of activated T cells and activated T-cell-induced cells. To analyze this function, we have developed an in vitro model in which monocyte-derived dendritic cells (Mo-DCs) are cocultured with T cells. We showed that PD-L1, a ligand for PD-1, and PD-L2 are expressed on Mo-DCs. We found that PD-1 on activated T cells is expressed after coculture with Mo 520fdb1ae7
