The universal declaration of human rights should never be arbitrarily deprived of their rights. It is a living document that requires considerable investment and legislative support. The process of states adopting the declaration is not always harmonious, but the standards are drawn from the interaction of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights with the varying traditions and responsibilities of states. It is a document that has been committed to the protection of human rights, including the right to equal treatment and participation in political, social, and cultural life. The declaration is a guiding inspiration for individual and social change, and it has been a cornerstone for the development of international human rights law. It is an instrument that promotes respect for human rights, and it reminds us that the right to a dignified life is universal.
