Carefully selected outfits, clean shoes, special dinners, new teachers and photos in memory. Children are brave as they enter an unknown space and let new friends and mentors into their world. Moms and dads work up a large portion of trust and send their little ones into the territory is unknown. Teachers get behind the wheel, which is arguably the most important job ever. AND I LIKE THAT. Funny. It's important. This marks a mark of a year and I am all to celebrate. What about the second day? And the next day? And all the many, many days after that? Let's give those days a nod they deserve. For teachers who have invested their precious time, effort and energy in learning and loving our children well. Here's to the new shoes that are shabby from the stairs, slides and playgrounds of the game. Here's a backpack stuffed with newsletters, practice sheets, and artwork. Here's a lunch box filled with cheese and crackers when you realize that your child won't take almond butter as a sensible peanut butter substitute. That's to the projects completed, the skills mastered, and the mistakes that get us there. Here's a commitment to stand up, show it, and live it every day. Here are the good days, the hard days, and all the days in between. For the hard work of growing up. For appearing day in and day out. The next day at school. Just keep your head down and follow this guide. One thing that really helps reduce the first day of school is the fright to visit school and meet teachers before the first day if possible. Many schools schedule open house where you and your family can meet with teachers, pick up your schedule, and tour to school to get a feel for where all your classes will be. It's kind of a trial run for a real first day at school. So be sure to attend an open house if your school offers it. This will help you get lost, and appear late when you do it for real. If your school doesn't offer an open night open night, then introduce yourself to school to walk from classroom to class and plan the best times to stop your locker. You can show off these new heels or minis, but come lunchtime you wish you were in something more suitable for lugging around a giant backpack. Stick to something practical. Plan your first day of school attire with words handy but cool in mind. Put it on the bed, but then be sure to try it as well to make sure it's comfortable. You will spend a lot of time with your teachers over the next few months, so instead of being afraid of them, or despising them, get to know them. Who knows, your teachers may have some really cool interests that they can share with you that will make coming to school a lot more fun. Of course, teachers may seem a little mean on the first day. Don't worry - they just do it to scare you. They'll calm down next week. Be sure to show up to class on time, take notes, be respectful, and be diligent. You don't want their first impression of you to be bad. Focus on getting to know your new classmates, and catch up with last year's buddies after school. In a couple of months, you'll have more friends, not less. You probably haven't slept all summer playing video games and then missed breakfast most of the time. But, now that the school is back in session, it's time to get back to the routine of sleeping at a decent hour, get as close to 8 hours of sleep as possible, and breakfast in the morning. Try to start this night and morning routine at least two weeks before school starts, so it becomes a habit and then on the first day of school, you'll be good to go. You will learn better, be less moody, and be better prepared for the new challenges and adventures that this school year brings. Keep in mind that the first day can feel super long. But, it's just a mental trick because you're experiencing so many new things. Next week, when you're more familiar with your classes, it won't feel that way anymore. The first day of school is nerve-wracking for everyone, even if some of your classmates don't show it. Just try to stay as calm and focused as you can. As the school year gets rolling, you'll wonder why you're so worried in Queue. Article updated by Keisha Howard, Teen Advice Expert. The first day of high school is full of excitement and nerves for both students and teachers. You can your students are alone immediately, enthusiastically welcoming them to their class and welcoming them to the door with a smile, introduction, and handshake. The first day will inevitably include some logistics, like switching to class rules and revising the curriculum of the course. However, you can make an introduction to your students in your classroom without stress and positive by adding these fun first day high school activities. Help the teens in your class relax with the fun round of Will You Rather, a game in which you pit two options against each other. Sometimes the choice is serious, other times they are stupid. Sometimes neither of them is a good option, forcing students to choose the lesser of two evils. To start with these would have you rather clues. Do you prefer... Do you live in the mountains or on the beach? Be a famous author or a famous musician? Is it able to read minds or be invisible? Spend a day at an amusement park or mall? Do you have a private jet or a fancy sports car? Live somewhere that is always warm and sunny, or somewhere that is always cold and snowy? After you ask each question, instruct students to move to one side of the room if they choose the first option and the other if they prefer the other. If you prefer to keep everyone in their seats, give students different markers of color choice (e.g. colored paper plates, paint stir sticks). Students hold one color for the first choice and another color for the second. Get to know your students and help them get to know each other with the classic icebreaker game of two truths and lies. Tell students to share two true facts and one fact about themselves. Once a student shares their facts, other students must guess which statement is a lie. For example, a student might say: I moved here from California. My birthday is in October. And, I have three brothers. Other students then guess which of the three statements is not true until the first student reveals that they are an only child. You can start the game by sharing two truths and lies about yourself and then walking around the room until each student gets his turn. Start the school year with this introspective activity. Invite students to write a letter to their future. Provide a list of questions, tips or beginner suggestions, and instruct students to answer questions in full sentences. Try some of the following: I wear... My best friend ... What I'm looking forward to most this year... What's your favorite item? What are your favorite songs, TV shows, books, games or musical performers? What are your hobbies? What's your favorite way to spend your free time? Provide envelopes so that students can seal their letters as soon as they are Then, students must hand over their sealed letters to you for safe storage. Return the messages in on the last day of school. Recognize your students with a questionnaire. Write five to ten questions - some light-hearted, somewhat thoughtful - on the board or provide a printed handout. Ask questions like: What is one of your favorite memories? Are you an introvert or an extrovert? What qualities does a great teacher have? How do you learn best (examples: quiet environment, practical, listen, read)? If you could only eat one food for the rest of your life, what would it be? Students must submit ready questionnaires. Use this activity as an opportunity to get an idea of your personalities. Take a break from the first day of school stress with pop quiz - pop culture quizzes. Create a list of 10-15 questions about current pop culture, from music to movies in advance. Then, to start the game, divide the class into several teams. Spread paper and pens/markers or personal boards for each team. Stand in front of the room and ask one question at a time. Give teams time (30-60 seconds) to calmly coax their answers. Each team must write down its final answer on a piece of paper. Once the time and time and time, ask each team to delay their response. Every team that answers correctly earns a point. Get the score on the board. Whichever team earns the most points wins. Create a sense of community and connection in your class through this activity. Prepare one or two questions in advance to ask students. Here are some examples: What makes you most nervous about the new school year? What is one thing you wish everyone at school knew about you? What is your biggest goal this school year? Write your question (s) on the board, give the index card to each student. Explain that they should write down their responses without including their name and assure them that their answers are completely anonymous (but that they will be passed on to the group). Give the class 5 minutes to complete the action. When time is asked by students to fold their cards once and place them in a trash can or trash can at the front of the room. Once everyone has turned into their index cards, read the answers aloud. Many students may be surprised to learn how similar they are to their classmates. To expand the activity, moderate a brief discussion of the students' reactions to hearing the responses of their classmates. Give your students the opportunity to get to know you through a silly few choice quizzes. To create a quiz, come up with a list of funny or surprising facts about yourself. Then turn them into multiple choice issues. Be sure to include some ridiculous wrong answers. Once the students have finished the quiz, go for the correct answers and the students class their own quiz. This often generates fun, engaging discussions, as many students are curious to hear backstories over some of the You are included in the quiz. Divide students into pairs and recognize the list of interview questions of the tips. Tell students to be on the lookout for things they have in common. Then give the students 10 minutes to interview their partners. When the time and time and time, each student should present their partner in the classroom using the information they learned during the meeting. Each presentation should include a funny fact and a newly discovered common personality. This activity is a great way for students to get to know each other. In addition, many students find it less intimidating to talk to a class about someone else rather than themselves.
