U.S. law enforcement is taking a stand against Microsoft's billion-dollar anti-piracy program, WIPO Internet treaties, and ACTA, the EU proposal to crack down on illegal downloads, by going after BitTorrent sites. The FBI, along with police and prosecutors from around the country, this week filed a motion to seize seven popular peer-to-peer file sharing sites, including the Pirate Bay, KickassTorrents and ExtraTorrent. The agencies argue that the owners of the sites are either involved in copyright infringement themselves or "facilitate, promote, encourage, and give rise to such infringement." And the prosecutors are taking a very narrow view of the law when they describe "facilitation" as "assisting or assisting in the promotion or offering of goods and services for reproduction, distribution, performance or public display." To prove that the site owners are guilty of copyright infringement, the feds will have to prove that the sites are "primarily used" for the purpose of infringing on copyrights. And all of the prosecutions will have to rely on evidence obtained from the private investigation by international law enforcement, which will be rejected by courts as insufficient. "The Government's expansive view of the statutory phrase 'facilitate' would allow the Government to indict anyone who provides a website in the United States, regardless of his or her knowledge of or involvement in copyright infringement, or who provides a website accessible from the United States," says the motion. "In other words, one could be indicted for running a website that simply provides a link to infringing materials, or even for providing a 520fdb1ae7
