Many major U.S. cities, including New York, Philadelphia and Chicago, have been plagued by a recent increase in shootings and subsequent deaths, escalating the debate over gun violence, which has disproportionately affected communities crippled by the coronavirus pandemic and subsequent recession. Our Save Streets (S.O.S.) team holds a peace march in response to an increase in shootings in ... [+] Bedford Stuyvesant neighborhood in Brooklyn on July 16, 2020 in New York City. The march took place near the scene in Brooklyn, where a one-year-old boy, Davell Gardner Jr., was recently shot and killed. Davell was shot near a playground during a picnic Sunday when gunfire broke out. Two other adults were injured in the shooting in the evening. New York City has seen an increase in gun violence over the past month with 9 people killed, including children, and 41 others injured on the Fourth of July weekend alone. (Photo: Spencer Platt/Getty Images) Getty Images KEY FACTS A total of 777 shootings were recorded in New York city between January 1 and the end of July, which is more than New York had in the 2019 calendar year. More than 240 people have been killed, and more than 1,000 shootings have been recorded so far this year in Philadelphia. According to statistics released Saturday by the Chicago Police Department, in the first seven months of 2020, there have been 440 homicides and 2,240 people shot (which represents 150 more and 760 more shootings in Chicago compared to the same period last year). A review of crime statistics among the nation's 50 largest cities by the Wall Street Journal found that reported homicides were up 24% this year. President Donald Trump has blamed increased violence in many U.S. cities on Democratic lawmakers (on Friday, he highlighted his New York and, what he called, his radical left-wing mayor). However, according to the WSJ analysis, the increase in it's a bipartisan problem, with homicides increasing at a double-digit rate in most of the major cities run by Republicans, including Miami, San Diego, Omaha, Tulsa, and Jacksonville. Crucial quotes: It only gets worse from here, said Joseph Giacalone, a retired NYPD sergeant and an assistant professor at John Jay College of Criminal Justice. As the shooting continues, so will retaliation. It's a vicious cycle that the NYPD worked hard to mitigate, but that they are no longer able and, in some cases, willing to do. Key background: The increase in gun violence has been particularly worrying lately. In the previous six days alone, 36 people had been victims of gun violence in New York, resulting in seven deaths. The month of July was extremely violent in Chicago, with 105 homicides and 584 shootings reported. According to Eduardo Bocanegra, senior director of REGI Chicago, the recession and coronavirus lockdowns have hurt programs aimed at curbing violence. NYC Mayor Bill de Blasio announced an End Gun Violence Plan last month, but pundits have criticized the plan for its lack of detail. It's a perfect storm out there. Not only are the courts not fully open, but they are not neglecting to notice that there is a historical pandemic and economic crisis at the moment, de Blasio said. President Donald Trump has often boasted about how federal agents sent to Portland suppress insurgents in that city. Trump also recently announced his intention to send federal agents to Chicago and other Republican-led cities. In response, Chicago Mayor Lori Lightfoot wrote a letter to Trump, stating: We need you, as President, to take the lead in enacting meaningful and common sense gun legislation, which you have so far refused to do. Tangent: Comments from Rep. Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez (D-NY) last month about the root causes for recent crime increases in New York led to a fierce backlash from Republican pundits and lawmakers. Republicans are all upset that I'm linking the dots between poverty and crime. I know most of them haven't experienced or seen these issues firsthand, but I have. This may be difficult for them to admit, but poverty and crime are largely linked, both violent and non-violent, Okasio-Cortez said in mid-July. Large number: 2,262: This is the number of murders recorded in New York in 1990 (approximately equivalent to the combined number of murders in The nation's 25 cities so far this year), which serves as a reminder that homicide rates are still well below historically high levels.
