Based on a new study from Carbon Black, the market research firm (via Dark Reading) found that mobile ad fraud is now the single most targeted network. That is a whopping 1,000 attacks per day. More on that later. The No. 2 target? The YouTube network. Mobile Ad Fraud More than 10,000 mobile ad fraud attacks were made during the period analyzed by Carbon Black, according to the firm's analysis. "As a result of these recent attacks, there is now a new #1 ad fraud target: mobile ad networks," the researchers noted. Why? According to Carbon Black, this is because mobile app developers are increasingly using the ad networks to deliver their content. They are using the networks to deliver the code to run the apps. To ensure the code runs, there must be a trust of the network – the network can't run code that would harm the user. Which explains why the ad networks are targeted. And it also explains why the most targeted network is mobile. Of course, this happens with desktop advertising as well. But in that case, it's more targeted to financial services and the like – and not mobile. YouTube, Again With more than 10,000 attacks against ad networks, YouTube again is the second-most targeted network. That's at least another 1,000 attacks per day, according to Carbon Black. As the researchers noted, YouTube is increasingly being used by the app developers to deliver their apps. "This brings us to a big point: if you make a mobile app, you need to take extra care about how you use the ad networks, because the risks are much greater than in desktop ads," Carbon Black warned. The Carbon Black report noted that attacks 520fdb1ae7
