While Parks And Recreation only received mixed reviews for its first season, it soon blossomed into one of tv's sharpest and funniest comedies. This was helped largely by the fantastic cast, which included Amy Poehler, Chris Pratt, Aubrey Plaza, and Adam Scott. Ron Swanson of Park And Recreation quickly became a cult character due to Nick Offerman's performance. His strange quirks and motivational quotes made him the show's breakout character, but despite appearing humorless and distant, he was also concerned about the people he works with - even though he thinks they are. He also has his own personal recipe for success, which he sums up in Ron Swanson's Pyramid of Greatness. Related: Parks and Recreation: Where are they now? Ron Swanson's Pyramid of Greatness is explained in the first episode of Season 3 of Park And Recreation, where he teaches to a group of children that he is training for basketball. Let's break your infallible route to personal greatness, level by level. Honor level 1: If you need it to be set, you don't have it. Level 2 America: The only country that matters. Body cleansing: Only women shave under the neck. Swanson's Pyramid of Greatness emphasizes certain points, such as the prevention of skimmed milk and fish meat, which he believes to be practically a vegetable. Honor is obviously at the top of the pyramid, but other important ingredients for maximum personal accomplishment include a proper haircut and thick facial hair, joinery, a firm handshake and selfishness. In reality, Swanson's Pyramid of Greatness is probably not a great recipe for success, but it gives a unique view of the character's head space. Ron Swanson of Parks And Recreation is considered one of the greatest supporting actors to have appeared in a comedy series and his Swanson Pyramid of Grandeur is a great illustration of why.
