The game also features a simplified control scheme, combined with fully destructible terrain, enemies, and even other units (to a certain extent). An in-game map displays large icons of important areas on the screen, and the player has limited control over what each area is used for. As such, Horde: The Citadel . In order to make a multiplayer game work, maps are normally one of two types: an "open map" with no central building and everything just randomly generated on a single map, or a "sandbox map" where each player has their own base (almost like Day Z in action), and other players cannot invade their base. The game, however, is playable solo or with a human player, where one player takes the role of the leader, and the other takes the role of the army. In Horde: The Citadel . In Horde: The Citadel, the game is divided into two parts: the game itself and a fantasy-themed web-based information management system (DWARF, short for "Defense and War Planning Resources FORume") used by the AI. The game was made by Relic Entertainment, famous for games such as Relic's own Dawn of War (1999), Master of Orion (1995), and other real-time strategy games. The Horde II: Battle for the World . For some extra features, each unit has a limited number of skills that it can perform with the chosen weapon. These skills can be used by other units to perform actions such as healing a wounded unit or giving support to another unit. In the original release, only "units" are playable in the game, which would not be the case in later releases. The game is also available as part of the title Wargames (World) Game (WAG) which is a collection of 34 computer wargames. In June 2011, Rebellion Developments announced that it would be releasing a version of this game for the iPad. On September 10, 2011, "Horde: The Citadel" was released for the iPad. Reception Horde: The Citadel garnered generally favorable reviews, currently holding a Metacritic score of 71% on Steam. It was awarded in the strategy category of the IGN's 2011 Best PC Games.
