Richard Durbin, around 10:15 a.m. last Thursday, expressed delight with Durbin's outline of a bipartisan immigration pact and praised the efforts of senior Illinois Democrats, according to White House officials and congressional aides. The president then asked if Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), his once enemy-turned-ally, was on board, which Durbin confirmed. Trump invited lawmakers to come with him at noon, according to people familiar with the call. But when they arrived in the Oval Office, both senators were surprised to see that Trump was far from ready to complete the agreement. He was fired up and surrounded by hard-line conservatives such as Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.), who seemed confident that the president was being aligned with them, according to one person with knowledge of the meeting. Subscribe to the Post Most newsletter: Today's most popular stories on The Washington Post Trump told the group that he wasn't interested in the terms of the bipartisan deal that Durbin and Graham were putting together. And when he shrugged off the proposals of Durbin and others, the president called Africa 'crap countries', denigrated Haiti and became angry. According to Republicans and Democrats familiar with it, the meeting was short, tense and often dominated by loud cross-talk and swearing. Trump's ping-pong from deal to feud, from delight to fury, by definition immigration talks between the White House and Congress, perplexing members of both parties as they navigated the president's vulgarity, his belligerence and his willingness to suddenly change his position. The explosion once again derailed those negotiations and raised the possibility of a government shutdown because of the fate of hundreds of thousands of young illegal immigrants, known as dreamers. This account of the events surrounding Thursday's explosive meeting is based on interviews with more than a dozen White House officials, Capitol Hill aides and lawmakers. The fight has left congressional leaders unsure whether they will eventually come to an agreement. Some remain optimistic that Trump can be returned to the political center and will cut a deal that would expand border security to protect those under the Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals (DACA) program, which Trump has ordered to end. The president is indispensable for getting a deal, Graham said in an interview. Time will tell. Last Thursday was a critical moment in stalled negotiations, revealing the president's priorities even as the debate fell apart. Trump lamented that the deal lacked money for a wall he promised along the U.S.-Mexico border. He also countered that the Democratic Party's proposals to adjust visa lottery and federal policies for immigrants with temporary protected status would expel more people from countries he deems undesirable to the United States, rather than attracting immigrants from places like Norway and Asia, according to people familiar with it. Attendees, who were alarmed by the racial overtones of Trump's remarks, were even more dismayed when the topic of the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC) came up, the people said. At one point, Durbin told the president that members of that faction - an influential Group of the House of Representatives - were more likely to agree to a deal if some countries were included in the proposed protections, according to people familiar with the meeting. Trump has been curtseyed and dismissive, saying he doesn't make immigration policies to satisfy the CBC and doesn't particularly care about the bloc's demands, according to people briefed on the meeting. You have to be kidding, said one adviser, describing Trump's reaction. White House Chief of Staff John Kelly was in the room and was largely a stone-faced, not giving any apparent reaction when Trump told the shitty country or when he said Haitians should not be part of any deal, White House advisers said. At one point, Graham told Trump that he should use different language to discuss immigration, people said, informed of the meeting. When Trump fought back against Democrats, Republican lawmakers called for him. Rep. Bob Goodlatte said Graham and Durbin their proposal would not fly and he told the group that they should instead take it more Bill. Durbin was not interested, White House officials said. After Graham left, he told associates that he was concerned about what he heard in the Oval Office, according to people who spoke to him, and that it was obvious that the deal's antagonists had gotten to Trump. Graham and Durbin also told allies that they were stunned that other lawmakers were present - and that Trump's tone seemed so different than it did days or even hours ago, according to people close to them. Graham declined to comment on the president's reports of obscenity. He told others in his circle that commenting only hurts the chance of a deal and that he wants to maintain a relationship with the president. Initially, there was hope for a meeting on Thursday. Trump told lawmakers during a partially televised session two days earlier that he was flexible. I will sign it, he said Tuesday. He even said he would be willing to lock the door of the cabinet if they wanted to negotiate at the White House, according to people who have heard his comments. At a previous meeting, Trump said he wanted a deal and that even those in the conservative House freedom caucus should work with Durbin. Within hours and days after that, a bipartisan group of senators - Graham, Durbin, Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.), Sens. Robert Menendez (D-N.J.), and Sens. Michael F. Bennet (D) and Cory Gardner (R) of Colorado - began the meeting and generally agreed with the proposal. But some White House officials, including conservative adviser Stephen Miller, feared that Graham and Durbin would try to cheat on Trump by signing a bill that would hurt him and hurt him with his political base. As word leaked Thursday morning on Capitol Hill that Durbin and Graham were heading to the White House, Legislative Affairs Director Mark Short began calling lawmakers and shared many of Miller's concerns. Soon, Goodlatte, one of the most conservative members of the House of Representatives on immigration, headed to the White House. Trump also called House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy (R-Calif.) and asked him to come, McCarthy said. Sens. David Purdue (R-Ga.) and Cotton were also invited to hurry. Late in the morning, before Durbin and Graham arrived, Kelly, who had already been briefed on the deal, spoke with Trump to tell him that the proposal probably wouldn't be good for his agenda, White House officials said. Kelly, a former Homeland Security secretary, has taken on an increasingly aggressive and influential role in immigration negotiations, urging lawmakers and meeting with White House aides daily - more than he does on other topics. One official said he had very strong feelings. But he's not a lone voice. Trump in recent weeks also more with conservatives such as Rep. Mark Meadows (R-N.C.) on immigration, immigration, people said. White House officials say Kelly intends to reach an agreement on dreamers and border security, and told Trump that the southwest border is worse than it was a few years ago, and that he could be president to change the status quo. As soon as we saw what was happening at the meeting a few days earlier, we were scared, said immigration hard lineman Mark Krikorian, who runs the Center for Immigration Studies. Trump, he said, has hawkish instincts on immigration, but they're not very developed, and he's never been through this kind of legislative battles. After Thursday's meeting, Trump began telling allies that the proposal was a terrible deal for me, according to a friend he spoke to, and that Kelly and other aides and confidants were right to call for him to back down. It was not a serious offer. It wasn't seen as a serious proposal because it did so little to address the immigration issues the president was talking about, said Meadows, who heads the conservative House freedom caucus. This was if I had to put it in the range of 1 to 10, with 10 being the most conservative and 1 being the most liberal, I would give it 2.5. By Thursday evening, many White House aides were concerned that the story was exploding beyond normal levels for the Trump controversy, but they continued their plans overnight: a dispatch for Deputy National Security Adviser Dina Powell, former Goldman Sachs executive and ally Jared Kushner and Ivanka Trump. Almost every high-ranking official dived into the exclusive Italian restaurant Cafe Milano in Georgetown to toast Powell. There was little effort to significantly push back on the story that night because aides knew that Trump had said it and that the president wasn't even too upset, according to people involved in the negotiations. Then Friday morning, Trump appeared to suggest in a tweet that he didn't use the unwelcome word at all: The language I used at the DACA meeting was tough, but it wasn't the language used. Three White House officials said Purdue and Cotton told the White House that they had heard a carnage rather than a hole, allowing them to refute the president's comments on television over the weekend. At first, they publicly said they couldn't remember what the president said. I expect us to get more Republican support for this proposal because it's really the only game in town. I expect there will be more negotiations - we didn't write the Bible, Graham said Monday. We have written a suggestion that over time we can make it better. Meadows said he and Goodlatte were working to add an immigration policy based on in his conservative version. He said most Republicans are not going to line up for Graham and Durbin and should instead rally behind his proposal, which is unlikely to fly with Democrats. Based on what they are Initially, Durbin and Graham run a marathon and they're only in Mile 2, Meadows said.
