Vibrational therapy is done by putting a fork of tune on the body (muscles, bones, spine or joints) to create balance in the energy system, while sound therapy involves keeping the tune of fork several inches away from the body or near the dog's ear. A melon fork is an aqueous two-toned fork usually made of steel. It will be resonated through a constant note when hit against an activator or surface. Tons of music and pitch depend on the length of the fork's tone. The frequency is measured in hertz. A fifth pure interval (from C to G, for example) is most commonly used for vibrational or sound healing (an interval is the space between two notes). With a stiff fork, the distance between tons is a fifth interval. The frequency of OM (136.10 hertz), known as earth vibrations, helps create deep diverting of your dog, and has a lot of healing quality. You can buy OM mixed forks that plumb to create this cured frequency. The three mercury OM I recommend are 90.73 hertz (11/2 times lower than OM), current OM frequency of 136.10 hertz, and 204.15 hertz (11/2 times higher than OM). Tune the inexperienced forks and can be purchased at many topical wellness centers and on the internet. A simple three-step 1 treatment: To activate a mixing fork, keep the bottom (end of skin) of the fork off your finger and gently hit the flat side of the fork against an activator (tires containing tires) or arms/legs. You will see the slight movement of the fork and will feel and hear the hum of this action created. Place the fork up to your ears to experience what your dog will hear and feel. Practicing this triggers several times to make sure they are comfortable with the movement. 2. You need to get your dog to reside in the hum and sound the fork mixed before you use it on his body. To let him experience the sound and hum, simply activate the fork and keep him about 6 in his nose. He'll be able to hear the soft vibrations, which will help facilitate any fears he might have when you start working with the fork around his head and body. 3. Vibrational Therapy can help many physical problems such as physicians, fractures, tear tendons or muscles. Choose an area of concern about your dog's body (maybe a knee has freezing). Activate the fork to tune by striking it against an activator or your legs/arms, then keep the br in the fork near the healing void area. Avoid pressing the fork directly to the body, as the hum can cause pain. Keep keeping the fork wicked on the treatment area until the hum stops (you will be able to feel when it stops because you're still holding the fork by the shank). Perform a series of three triggers in the same area of treatment. The first activation opens the body's energy system, the second to clear it, and the third creates balance in it. If you prefer to try healing sounds, hit the fork to activate it and keep it close to your dog's ear (about 36 away) or lock in (but not on) a portion of his body that requires healing. Keep the fork in the area of anxiety until it stops to vibrate fully, then do the triggers another twice. To help keep your dog in balance, make the therapy sound three times on each side of itself or body. As a general rule, vibrations therapy will help integrate into a deeper additional healing modality level such as Reiki, TTouch, acupuncture and massage. Sound therapy, meanwhile, will help solve with your dog's plot. When you actually participate in giving your dog healing, you foster a closer relationship with him as well as help him to better health, happiness and quality of life. Using a fork to give him vibrational healing or sound is a simple and expensive way to do both! Page 2 Thank you for your interest in writing for Animal Wellness.
