Here's an overview of welding helmets for sale and what you can expect to save: Miller's digital infinity welding helmet When you need a lightweight helmet with the biggest view of the most challenging jobs, Digital Infinity remains one of the best options on the market. The wide viewing area of 13.4 inches is currently the largest in the welding industry and makes it particularly safe to weld at a factory or construction site where several projects occur at the same time. Welders will enjoy excellent protection with 4 arc sensors and a full range of shades for grinding, cutting and welding, including X-Mode for TIG welding and out of project position. Redesigned headgear minimizes stress and stress, providing a wide range of adjustments for the best fit. Easy-read digital controls make minor snap adjustments, while the helmet also has the ability to track arc time. Learn more about the digital infinity welding helmet Miller Digital Elite Welding Helmet Miller Digital Elite Welding Helmet offers all the same security features as digital infinity, including four arc sensors and a full range of shadow options: Weld (Shade 8-13), Cut (Shade 5-8), Grind (Shade 3) and X-Mode (Shade 8-13). The main differences are the viewing area a little less, with less peripheral vision and fewer tracking controls. Of course, the other function that welders will notice about this helmet is the price. It's cheaper than digital infinity while still offering some of the best features on the market. Learn more about Miller's digital high-end welding helmet digital performance welding helmet marked down by $80 on this article, Digital Performance offers the basics of protecting a welding helmet with three arc sensors and the ability to grind, weld and cut modes.
