I will also give advice that is specific for preparing for the final AP exam. In the first section, I will detail a step-by-step process that you can follow to create and execute a customized study plan for the test. This process includes performing a diagnostic test, assessing weaknesses, studying the content areas you've struggled with the most, and conducting additional practice tests to verify your progress. To follow the study plan, I'll list some key study tips to remember as to review the course's content and take practice exams. I'll also give notes for each subject area that you can use to study for tests in class and review for the AP exam. Having all this information in one place will hopefully make studying for AP Human Geography much less stressful. 4-Step Study Plan for AP In this section, I will go through the steps of a basic study plan for the human ap geography exam. Most of the principles will also apply to study for tests throughout the class, but full practice tests are only important when preparing directly for the final exam. You can use shorter subject-specific questionnaires to diagnose in different units of the Human Geography course at the beginning of the school year. For planning purposes, here's the estimated time required for each step below: Step 1: 2.5 hours Step 2: 1 hour Step 3: 2 hours Step 4: 2.5 hours It should take about eight hours to study for the human geography ap exam. Of course, you can always extend the time you spend reviewing content if you're rusty on a bunch of different topics or just want to be further thorough. Step 1. Take and score a complete practice test The first step is to take a complete AP Human Geography practice test so that you can get a better idea of your current score level. When you take the test, time it to the actual exam specifications, so you'll be able to tell if you have problems with time management. Note that in the test, you only have one hour to answer 60 multiple-choice questions; this comes out a minute per question. To be on the safety side, though, try to get up to about 45 seconds per question. The only way to get used to this pace is to take practice tests under realistic conditions. Although there are no official practice tests available, we have collected some of the best unofficials in our guide. As you take the test of practice, circle or take note of any questions for which you feel nothing less than totally confident in your answer. Even if you get these questions right, you should reexamine the content later in your review to increase your comfort level with the material. When you're done, write down the test so you can see where you fit in the AP range. Then set an improvement goal and decide how many hours you will need to put into preparation. If you have a few months, you should be able to put in 20+ hours of study time. This will be an adequate amount of study if you are hoping to improve by more than one AP point. If you just need to improve with an AP point or are just looking to raise your score in the same range, you might be able to wait until the month before the test to start the rest of the process. In total, you should not need to study for more than 10-20 hours. Step 2: Go through your mistakes If you decide to start the rest of this process now, go through your mistakes on the human geography practice test and classify them. This is how you decide on the areas of content and skills to focus on in your review. There's no point in studying the concepts and terms you've already mastered. If to see real improvements, this is the most important stage of the study process. You can't fix your mistakes unless you know what they are first! Step 3: Study the appropriate content After you finish analyzing mistakes, start looking at notes that correspond to the areas where you had the most test problems; make sure you full absorption of information while reading. In this case, flashcards might be useful because there are so many terms to remember for AP Human Geography. If you have found particularly challenging free answer questions, practice a few more of those before moving on to the next step. You can also use some of the sites I'll link later in this article to review specific topics with short multiple-choice questionnaires. Step 4: Take a second full practice test When you feel you have fully addressed all your mistakes in the first practice test, you can take a second test to see if your scores have improved. Compare the new score with the goal you set in the first step and decide whether you want to go through the study process again or if you're satisfied with your current score. If you're satisfied, you can take a break and just do a little light review until the test. If you haven't improved, reevaluate how you've done this process and make some changes to your strategy in the next round. Were you in an environment that was distracting too? Did you pass your notes without really absorbing them? Are you just generally a little rusty? These are the types of things that can cause progress to stall. Clean the rust with an acidic solution of facts. AP Human Geography: 3 Essential Study Tips below are some of the most valuable strategies to keep in mind as you go through your study plan to prepare for the AP Human Geography exam. These tips should also be helpful for your preparation for smaller assessments throughout the school year in your AP class. #1: Know your regions To get full credit for most free answer questions, you will need to provide specific examples to support your answers. This means being able to identify the characteristics of the world's regions in terms of their different cultures, demographics and physical environments. You'll see a map of the main regions covered by AP Human Geography in the content section of this guide, along with a list of seven units. You should be able to locate each region and identify the relationship it has with each of the seven subject areas. #2: Memorize Terminology While knowing your way around a map is important, much of AP Human Geography is about your knowledge of terminology. I highly recommend making flashcards or using flashcards online in your prep (I'll put a link to some of these in the upcoming content section!). Many multiple-choice questions are essentially just asking for definitions, and some Free answer begins by asking you to define a term that the rest of the question addresses in depth. Even if it is not this right, knowing the way around the language of the field of human geography will make it much easier for you to understand questions without relying on shaky assumptions or inferences. #3: Paying attention to important patterns and theories of human geography is mostly a humanist subject, but there are some scientific elements to it. They appear in the form of demographic models that are introduced throughout the course. It's important to know how to read patterns and theories that represent. You should also know how they connect to major theories in human geography and what these theories say about the development of society. I'll give you a link to a complete list of models and theories at the end of the next section. Skyfar, how many times do I have to explain the homophones? IT'S YOU. Not. AP Human Geography Topics and notes AP Human geography covers seven major subject areas, or units. In this section, I will list each of them, followed by notes covering relevant subtopics. You can use these notes at the review stage of the content of the final study process and throughout the year as you review the class tests. You might find these notes (from CourseNotes) difficult to get through because they are written in such a way that it is hard to choose key concepts. There are a lot of long paragraphs without bolding important terms. If you find these borderline notes incomprehensible, you should try to get a review book that puts all the content in clearer terms. I think cracking AP Human Geography Exam is a good starting point. As a precursor to notes, here's a map of all the regions of the world that are discussed throughout the course. You will need to consider how these topics apply differently to different locations around the world: Unit 1: Geographical Geography And Human Geography Unit 2: Population and Migration Models and Processes Unit 3: Cultural Models and Processes Unit 4: Political Models and Processes Unit 5: Agriculture and Rural Land Use Models and Processes Unit 6: Cities and Urban Land-Use Models and Processes Unit 7: Industrial Models and Economic Development and ProcessesSince the terms are so important on this exam, I also recommend checking the full list of all the vocab covered by the course (provided by Quizlet), so you can review all the vocab you will need to know in one place. In addition, take a look at this overview of the different theories and models of human geography. When many people gather to form an urban community, they can't help but color everything.
