It's the same for all the people, singular and plural: I started, you started, it started, we played, they played. Rules of spelling a) We add -d (not -ed) to the word that ends in -e. Examples: like - loved, love - loved. b) If it ends with a consonant and -y, we change -y in -i. Examples: carry - carry, try - try. But: play - played because it ends vowel and -y. c) If the ordinary verb has only one syllable and ends in one vowel and consonant, we double the consonant to keep the same pronunciation. Examples: stop - stopped, fit - installed. The same rule applies to expressions with a large syllable if stress falls on the last syllable: ad'mit - admitted, pre'fer - preferably. But: enter - entered (stress is not on the last syllable). In words ending in -l consonant always doubles after one vowel: travel - traveled. 2. Regular past participation is the same. It is also formed -ed ending (worked, stayed). It is used in time and passive voice: I started, you started, it would start, it was started. Irregular verbs in English There are basically three irregular forms of verb in English: 1.Basic form (or naked infinitive): draw, lead, read, dream 2. Past time (also called preterite): preterume): led, read, dreamed or dreamed 3. Past engagement (sometimes called perfect participle): drawn, led, read, dreamed of or dreamed of As you can see from the above examples, some of the forms are completely different (draw - drawn - drawn), some have a different infinitive, but the other two are the same (lead - led - led), some have the same spelling, but different pronunciations (read - read - read), some of them can be both regular and irregular (dream - dream - dream - dream - dream / dream) and some have the same set of Top Past Just used to write and talk about the completed actions that have occurred so far, until now.
