If the outer and inner perianth leaves differ significantly in terms of colour or morphology, the flower is referred to as being heterochlamydeous. The outer whorl of perianth leaves (mostly inconspicuous) is then referred to as sepals and the inner whorl (often notably coloured) as petals (e. g. in Rosa – Rose). In contrast, in a perigone the inner and outer perianth leaves are of similar habitat (homochlamydeous perianth e. g. in Tulipa – Tulip) or only 1 whorl of perianth-leaves is developed (monoseriate or simple perianth, e. g. in Scleranthus – Knavel). The leaves of a perigone are referred to as tepals and may either be notable coloured (petal-like) or inconspicuous (sepal-like).

Especially in wind-pollinated species, the perianth can be reduced to small scales or husks (e. g. in Quercus – Oak Tree or the Poaceae – Grasses) or completely absent (e. g. in Populus – Poplar) or - Occasionally, sterile stamens (staminodia) can be developed petal-like and involved in the assembly of the perianth (e. g. in some Ranunculaceae – Buttercup family members).

The following terms are used to describe the diversity of shapes and specialisations of the perianth (cf. also figure 3-15).
