Efficacy and safety of pentazocine for opioid-induced vomiting. The objective of the study was to evaluate the efficacy and safety of pentazocine for the treatment of opioid-induced vomiting (OIV) in an adult population. This was an open-label, parallel-group, single-center study in which patients with OIV were treated with a single dose of pentazocine or an oral emetic. Patients in the pentazocine group received an initial dose of 25 mg, which could be increased to 75 mg as needed to provide complete relief. Patients who were emetic-free or nausea-free at 90 minutes were then treated with an oral dose of 5 mg to achieve complete relief. Patients who remained emetic-free were discharged; those who had nausea or vomiting were treated with a second dose of 25 mg of pentazocine. Of 58 patients enrolled, 53 (91%) were successfully treated with a single dose of 25 mg pentazocine. Of 45 patients whose symptoms resolved with pentazocine, 38 (84%) were pain free and 35 (78%) were without nausea. Of 33 patients who required a second dose of pentazocine, 30 (91%) had complete relief. Ten patients were emetic-free at 90 minutes, and seven were treated with a second dose of pentazocine. No patients in the study discontinued the study because of adverse events. The results of this study suggest that a single oral dose of pentazocine is effective and well tolerated in the treatment of opioid-induced emesis. There is no doubt that Twitter is the preferred social media platform for many for several reasons. One, the platform is simple and fast. You can quickly share and comment on a wide range of information, and by using hashtags, you can limit the number of tweets that you see. This allows you to focus on a specific subject and set up an easy way to follow the conversation. Another reason that Twitter has gained so much popularity is that it enables you to engage in one-on-one communication with other users. You can easily send direct messages to specific people, and your tweets are also displayed on other users' Twitter feeds, which allows you to form friendships with others that you wouldn't necessarily have otherwise. But can you really trust other people on Twitter? Are they trying to get personal information from you, or is there more to their Twitter account than meets the eye? The following are 520fdb1ae7
