Pants are hard for everyone, but they can be very difficult for little people, especially when it comes to new trends. Luckily, if you're looking hard enough, you can find raw hem jeans for short people - it just takes a bit of extra perseverance. The raw hemline trend is especially fun, so it should be something that everyone can enjoy, regardless of whether you fit into a small, high or average growth category. After all, it adds a sharp appeal to otherwise choppy and proper (and simple) jeans - it adds a smidge that has a rock 'n' roll flavor that's always good. So, what's the best way to find an appearance if you're on the shorter side? Now of course some brands offer miniature sizes, making your job easier. But even for brands that don't do this, it's still possible to look at the different lengths of the sema offered and find a pair that suits you. It's also worth looking at the different lengths of cropped trousers - capri lengths can turn out to be ankle skimmers, while in turn ankle skimmers may turn out to be just the perfect length. Katie buckleitnerGetty Images At this very moment, I have jeans I absolutely love to sit in my dresser. They only fit me right in almost every way... but unfortunately the legs are too long for my 5'4 frame and I still don't wear them outside my apartment. Yes, I know I can wear heels or wedges, and this whole problem will be solved, but I just refuse to wear anything other than sneakers or flats. And anyway, I don't have to change shoes just to keep my pants from being dragged to the ground! This content is imported from a embedded name. If this scenario is relatable, this is where some sewing skills come in handy, so you can hem and cut your pants yourself. But if you're new to the whole thread and needle thing, don't worry. Follow this step-by-step guide, courtesy of some knowledgeable YouTube creators, and then you can finally wear pants that are perfect length. (Just a warning though: Once you become an expert, don't be surprised if your friends start asking for some changes too.) How to hem your pants by hand: You definitely need some equipment for this that you may not yet have, like a seam ripper, thread, and fabric scissors. You start with one hand and then cut the other side after, and while it may seem like a lot of information, it will go faster on the second leg of the pants because you will just repeat the steps from the other leg. Basically, be super methodical about it and you get better with practice. (Or worst case scenario, if you get confused, just explain to the itch to the local tailor if they're open and they'll probably be to fix it.) This content is imported from YouTube. You can find the same content in a different format, or you may be able to find more information on your website. Take a seam ripper and cut the existing hem strands on both legs. Expand the hem, darken your pants and roll the material outside to where you want the new hem to hit. Once it is at the right length and even on all sides, stick the pin along the fold so that it stays in place. (Do it with only one hand, you can use the same measurements on the other as soon as you're done.) Measure the hem from above to where the new fold is, and make sure the measurement of the same happens all the way around the pants leg. Stick in more pins to hold in place once you've secured it even. Once you have added more contacts, measure 2 inches from the fold and mark the measurements around your leg with the handle. Cut along the pen marks you have just created to get rid of excess fabric. Repeat the steps from 1 to 5 on the other leg of the pants using the same measurements. Remove the pins, fold the hem on both sides and turn the whole pair of trousers inside out. Fold the bottom of one-legged pants to back back 2 inches and iron fabric all the way around the pants leg evenly so there is a certain crease. This will keep your new hem in place without any contact. Then take the side with a raw hem (you may notice that it's untangling already) and fold it under about a quarter of an inch. Do it all the way around the pants leg while using iron to keep it in place. Thread the needle, and starting at the side seam, stitch the top of the hem onto the pants, so it's safe. If you need more intro, watch this tutorial for an in-depth look at the shmyksh seam, and you'll want to choose a thread that is close to the color of your pants if you want to mix in. Repeat steps from 8 to 10 on the other hand, flip your pants back and you're done! If hand sewing sounds like a chore and you have a sewing machine, consider the steps below and a video tutorial that actually keep the original hemline. i.e., the finished product will look magically cut, not how you just fold the fabric underneath. This content is imported from YouTube. You can find the same content in a different format, or you may be able to find more information on your website. Try on your pants or jeans in the mirror and fold the bottoms with one hand where you want the new hem to sit. Measure the length of the folds after you take them off so you can repeat the steps on the other side. Use a chalk tailor or lightly to drop the handle where the end folds up on the pants legs. Mark the ponjm above the previous mark, too, and use the ruler to make sure all the lines you draw even. Make the same steps on the back of the leg pants. Make sure the crease rises highest mark and start pinning vertically all around feet to make the crease remain in place. Cut the fabric around your leg so it's about an inch to the left and then sew right under the original hem, removing the needle and smoothing the material (you don't want any puckering!), as you go. Cut excess tissue at the end of the leg, leaving about half an inch. Then with a seam ripper, remove the original stitches to open the existing hem. Remember that for this, you do not remove the original hem and create a new, you use the original hemline at the desired reduced length. Cut out the side seams, which usually form a heavy area, and the inner seam is a bit where you'll re sew. Next, cut the excess fabric at the end of the pants leg up to a quarter of an inch. All this cutting you're doing is removing the extra bulk, so the finished hemline will look smoother in front when you're done. Fold the raw edge back underneath, hiding any additional fabrics that are left. You can hammer the hemline, which will soften tougher materials like thick denim and make them easier to sew, in this YouTube here. Using the machine, sew the new hem slowly, folding it under as you go so that you are lined up correctly. Repeat all the steps on the other leg and then you hemmed your own pair of pants using the original hemline! How great!
