Nascar diecast collectibles collectors value guide

Best NASCAR diecast value guide? During a recent National Toy Collection, this question came up as I talked to another NASCAR diecast collector about how each of us define the meaning of our racing diecast collectibles. As our conversation continued, I realized that an up-to-date article on this topic would be useful to fellow collectors. Having recently done too many hours of research on this topic for my own education, this article aims to share with you my findings, and most importantly, my opinion on the options for answering age-old questions: How much does my NASCAR diecast cost? What is the value of my NASCAR diecast collection? In an article like this, it is important to reiterate that the information below reflects my opinion and my interpretation of the information available online and in print during my research. I strongly recommend that you do your own research to test these findings and come to your own conclusion. If you do so, I'm sure your findings will be closely related to mine. Without further ado, here are the best places to determine the value of your diecast collection, and the cost of individual diecast cars. #1 Diecast Registry Best NASCAR diecast price value guide. It's a slam dunk. No head-to-head. This site is totally the grail of racing diecast collectors around the world. Every diecast value collector that I know uses this site. Just check out their Diecast of the Day. DCR members receive such detailed information about each diecast in their collection. DCR NASCAR diecast price guide appeared online in 2003, at a time when Diecast Digest Magazine dominated NASCAR's diecast price market leadership, and Beckett was the clear second choice for NASCAR diecast value. However, Diecast Digest was out of business in 2006, and Beckett stopped updating its NASCAR diecast database in 2010. Why? There is one common denominator: the Diecast Registry. What's like about the Diecast Registry is the real price guide and it's database Driven. DCR provides reliable filters and sorting options to quickly find diecast of interest. It's easy to use. Even a novice computer user will quickly learn how to use the website. That's for sure. It provides both book value and retail value for each diecast. That's for sure. The diecast database and prices are updated weekly. It's full. It includes all diecast released in the modern era of diecast (1989 - present). It's full. It includes a diecast of more than 75 OEMs including Action, ADC, Brookfield, Ertl, Franklin Mint, GMP, Hot Wheels, Johnny Lightning, Lionel, Matchbox, RWR, Racing Champions, Revell, Team Caliber, University Of Racing, Winners Circle, etc. Sometimes, it's not enough to just know the value of diecasts. DCR provides a trend of value diecast diecast so you can see if the value of the diecast is growing or decreasing. It's huge when deciding which diecast to sell and what to pay when adding a new diecast to your collection. It's historic. The diecast trend charts show users the monthly cost of this diecast in 2003. It's education. For special paint schemes (like Dale Earnhardt Winston's Silver Choice), diecast comments tell you when the paint scheme was raced and how the driver did in the race. He's got pictures. Many of them. I have to see a dozen 1:24 Dale Earnhardt diecast sold in online auctions every month in the wrong box. DCR lets you look at a few photos of each diecast to see exactly what the packaging is right for. No conflict of interest. This is extremely important. DCR is not affiliated with NASCAR or Lionel, and DCR does not buy or sell NASCAR diecast. DCR is completely impartial. There is a reason Disney Corporation does not publish a price guide for its own collectibles. There is a reason Topps does not publish a price guide for their own baseball cards. This will lead to immediate distrust of their brands. The same goes for Lionel. Getting into a diecast price management business would be a huge conflict of interest and would damage their brand. It's Mobile Friendly. Users can access all DCR features from their mobile phone or tablet. What's not to like about the Diecast Registry is the free Bronze Membership will allow you to search the production list and add unlimited diecast to your garage, and sell unlimited diecast without listing fees or commissions. However, you will need to purchase a Silver, Gold or Platinum membership to access the price guide. However, membership prices are actually quite reasonable given the value in return. DCR only serves racing diecast (e.g. NASCAR, NHRA, WOO, Indy, F1, etc.). If you're looking for a value shared 1970 GTO from Franklin Mint, this isn't your site. DCR does not have a search function that allows you to enter SKU to find diecast. You will have to use their filters - which fortunately is quite easy and logical. #2 eBay If you are not aware of DCR then you are probably using eBay as a reference point. Its easy to look at completed auctions and get a general idea of what a certain diecast sells for. What eBay likes is it's easy to use. Most diecast collectors are already familiar with eBay. It's Tom. The sheer volume of diecast sold on eBay means there is a good chance that you will be able to find sales price information for popular drivers and diecast does. It is becoming more and more advanced. New features such as this element in trend $X can be useful. It's free. can access completed auctions to see sales prices without buying memberships. It's Mobile Friendly. Users can from a mobile phone or tablet What you don't like about eBay is short-term viewing. Users can only see sales prices in the last 90 days. So if your diecast hasn't sold in the last 90 days, you're SOL. This can be misleading. Just because an unknown buyer pays $99 for the 2013 Ty Dillon 1:24 Wesco diecast, doesn't mean it's worth $99. The DCR price guide will tell you that this diecast has a wholesale cost of about $15. This can be misleading. Just because an unknown seller sets up a $4 buy now at 2007 1:64 Dave Blaney M-Series diecast, doesn't mean it's worth $4. The DCR price guide will tell you that this diecast has a wholesale cost of about $20. This can be misleading. Because sellers can put a diecast in the wrong box, or use inaccurate descriptions, the sale price may be much lower, or much higher than expected. The aforementioned bullet points should make one issue of the accuracy of eBay this item in trending on $X function. Its not a Price Guide. Each user must calculate the value of the diecast based on the data they are looking at. Two users who want to determine the value of the same diecast can look at different data at several different times, and therefore come to different conclusions. #3 (link) TeraPeak and WorthPoint While eBay provides sales data that is limited to the previous 90 days, these sites provide sales data that goes back several years. Aside from this benefit, these sites have the same inherent problems as eBay when it comes to determining the value of diecast collectibles. What TeraPeak and WorthPoint like is it's easy to use. Sales records are arranged using a search phrase. Old data. These sites provide sales reports that are at a time of a few years. What's not to like about TeraPeak and WorthPoint are the same flaws as eBay. Its not a Price Guide. You have to figure it out based on the data returned from the search term. I was told that sales data from eBay is not available in these forums until its at least 90 days. This creates a huge problem. If you want to know what diecast is selling lately, you're SOL. Result? Now you have to go to eBay to see the latest sales data and then go to one of these outlets to see the old sales data, combine the two together, and then estimate the value of the diecast. What a mess. I also understand that these forums only contain sales data if the sale price was $10 or higher. This means that these forums will be useless for 99% of your scale of 1:64 diecast. Cost. The annual fee for these sites is about $200. It's my opinion that the $100 Diecast Registry Platinum membership returns a lot more value to a diecast collector - but what you have to decide for yourself. #4 Beckett Is a Well Known Presence in the Sports Card Collectors Market. In the late 1990s, Beckett began diecast in its popular Racing Collectibles Price Guide (which is still printed annually). There are two things that are important for diecast collectors to know: (i) Beckett stopped adding diecast to his catalog in 2008 (although some action models exist until 2010); Beckett stopped updating diecast values in 2013. See for yourself: look at the latest price changes on your homepage. Given these facts, I am amazed at the number of eBay sellers who still state Diecast's Beckett books value in their auction as a way to artificially trigger a higher sale price. What Beckett likes is some people, especially older collectors, like to keep the hardcopy book in their hands. This is a real price guide. However, Beckett's experience is a sports card. If you are a card collector, this is the place to be. Its great for sports cards. What Beckett doesn't like is Precision. The racing guide is famous for its high values, which do not reflect online sales in any forum. For example, Beckett has Dale Earnhardt's 1990 1:64 Racing Champions diecast valued at $20-$50. You can buy this diecast at an online auction all day for $5-$8, sometimes even less. Completeness. It doesn't have any diecast after the 2010 diecast. Photos and descriptions. They either don't exist or aren't good enough to give the user confidence that he is looking at the value of his exact diecast. Cost. You can purchase a hardcopy book (with these shortcomings) for about $25... or you can purchase a Diecast Silver Registry membership for $25. It's your choice. Cost. You can purchase Beckett's membership online (also with these drawbacks) for $99-$140... or you can purchase a Diecast Registry Gold membership for $50. Again, this is an easy choice for IMO. Heck, you can purchase a Diecast Registry Platinum membership for as little as $100. #5 Diecast-Search When you Google diecast price guide, Diecast-Search appears at the top of the search engine rankings. This is unfortunate because this site is almost irrelevant to racing diecast collectors. When the price guide homepage announces in red please don't use the filter below! It doesn't work properly, you know that you haven't landed on a professional site. What to like about Diecast-Search is free. But somehow the old saying you get what you pay for will come to mind no more than two minutes after you start using the site. What's not to like about Diecast-Search is There's No Filter Option. No pictures. Bad descriptions. The values they show for diecast from 2001 or so ahead are definitely the original sale price of the diecast, not any current market value. There are no diecast from 2013 to the present, so you can assume that it doesn't update for at least seven years. The database is the most incomplete incomplete You'll find it. For example, it has exactly four diecasts since 1991, twenty-three diecast since 1992, twenty-six diecast since 1993, twenty-nine diecast since 2011, and exactly one diecast since 2012. You get the picture. #6 Diecast Digest Magazine In the early 2000s, Diecast Digest Magazine was the 1,000-pound gorilla that dominated NASCAR's diecast price market guide. However, it was a conflict of interest that led to the death of DCD around 2005. As the internet became more popular, online diecast sales forums such as GoMotorBids and eBay were released. Collectors have begun to realize that Diecast Digest values are not in line with online sales. DCD values were 3-5 times higher than the sales prices seen in the emerging online market. Heavy Action Performance advertising doesn't work well with collectors either; the conflict of interest is obvious. The damage to the DCD brand was irreparable. Today DCD is not a real option as a guide to the price of diecast. Miz magazines have become more collectible themselves, as they reflect a time when NASCAR, and the racing diecast, was in its heyday.
