Autocad 2010 is a program developed by Autodesk, Inc..But in the wake of the 11th anniversary of the 9/11 attacks, the idea of dooming any American city to a terrorist strike and demonstrating to the world that we don't know how to stop them has lost a bit of its punch. Which is not to say that anyone has any faith in a post-September 11 style bin Laden takedown. A must-read article by Ross Douthat of the New York Times. Of course, the NYC cops are going to do whatever it takes to protect the city, but I suspect this post will lead to even more demonstrations against them… … I suspect that the debate about how to defeat terrorism — if indeed there is such a debate — will grow less ideological, and more practical. It will shift from what it means to be a libertarian (or libertarian-ish), and more from what it means to be a good cop, to what it means to be a competent cop. It's time to leave the ideological debate behind; for at least a time, we need to focus on what works. More than two decades into the war on terror, it's become increasingly clear that it's too early to say whether the war's been a success or a failure. In other words, it's time to stop debating about whether we've won or lost. In order to assess the war on terror honestly, we have to take into account not only what we've done, but also what we haven't done. And it's time to stop fighting over whether the war against al-Qaeda has produced a terrorist group that's comparable to, or even equivalent to, the terrorist groups that were around before the war on terror. For it's much too early to tell whether any of them are comparable to the terrorist organizations that have terrorized the world since 2001. Don't misunderstand me: al-Qaeda is an important group for one simple reason. It remains the primary threat to the security of the United States and its interests. But this isn't a time for celebrating the end of the war on terror — rather, it's a time to recognize that, for the foreseeable future, the U.S. and its friends are going to have to contend with al 520fdb1ae7
