The data is then stored in a database. Is there a way to call this command from a shell script, which I can then run at the Python script's first line? Edit: The command is only needed when the script is run. It's not executed at each python script execution, so I don't need to write anything to a file. A: You can use subprocess module >>> import subprocess >>> output = subprocess.call(["ls"]) >>> output the output will be the results from the ls command $> ls build_info.py .travis.yml *.c *.h all the output is going to be a list of all the files on your machine 520fdb1ae7
