Participants invested less money, and gave the fewest chocolates to a research partner after sharing food. Our findings warn against lay beliefs about sharing food, and suggest that “breaking bread” may exacerbate rather than ameliorate conflict.