They each have their own ideas of how they will handle weaning. Read this blog to learn about our experience. How a Family Weaned a Pacifier {#Sec1} ===== Our family was originally a totally bottle-feeding family until after the birth of our son. At the time of his birth, we had tried the sippy cup with sips for the first couple of days and we were ready to continue to supplement our daughter's bottle feeds. Then after about 1 month, we were able to get our daughter to take a bottle, but not necessarily a sippy cup. Then around the beginning of her second month, our daughter began to refuse her bottle completely. We began offering the sippy cup for the bottles as well and we tried a few different nipples on the sippy cups to no avail. Then we switched to the spout nipples, but they just weren't working. She would only take them if we offered them at a particular angle and the flow was really fast and wide. We found our daughter was also able to drink from a sippy cup with a narrow neck and low-flow nipples, but we didn't want to force the issue because we knew the sippy cup was part of her'safety net' when the bottles were not an option. The next thing we knew was that our daughter was refusing the bottle. We just couldn't figure out why. This was in the summer of 2013. We were at the end of bottle feeding and I felt like we needed to wean our daughter off her pacifier as well. In retrospect, I think she was looking for an explanation. She knew that we could stop the bottles, but she would cry when we would put the bottles down and she would look to the pacifier for comfort. I still felt a bit guilty, like we were depriving her of something, but we knew we were only temporarily missing out on something that was no longer a necessity. We decided that we would eliminate the pacifier at the next scheduled breastfeeding session. As I said, we had tried the sippy cups, nipples, and we had all come up short. I knew that we would have to be creative in order to wean her. I also knew that she would just cry if I gave her her pacifier. I went 520fdb1ae7
