Step forward and be the next! Creating a post-World War II England when he began this post-apocalyptic story, Philip K. Dick was well aware of the passage of time in terms of science and technology. He wrote in Time Out Of Joint that the pace of change has accelerated and the development of the bicycle has outstripped the rate of change in other areas. "The bicycle of that period was still considered an outlandish and dangerous piece of mechanism," he explained. "It's not like today when everyone has a bicycle. "Then it was a novelty to see one go by, unless the rider was an absolute giant. "It was the coming of the automobile that really stunned us, but I suppose in the beginning I had no idea how fast it was, and how quickly technology would change. "And if you think about it, it probably has. The bicycle is gone from the world, but I doubt that we'll ever see a wheelbarrow." And yet this landscape is not quite a dystopia. "There's no dictatorship here, no absolute power," Dick said. "Though there are times when I'd like there to be, because if there were, there would be a little bit less to go around." The book was an attempt to imagine the world after a nuclear war has occurred in the present day. Dick based his story on his memory of the bombed-out cities of London and Hamburg, and the two characters, Private William Dafoe and his opposite number, Colonel Kappel, are based on his former military colleagues. It is a novel in the tradition of "The Man In The High Castle" and George Orwell's Nineteen Eighty-Four, although Dick is quite aware of the contemporary relevance. "If you put all that into the story," he said, "if all of those things happened, they would certainly drive us crazy. "If you read between the lines of what I say in the book, and how people might react, you can figure out that it is certainly of a piece with the things happening in the world today." There are a number of ways of assessing the risk of fraud, but the most common is credit history. A credit report assesses the likelihood of a person's defaulting on a loan. The differences between the various credit reporting agencies (CRA) are a matter of interest rate, coverage area, or both. And the differences
