The authors studied patients with common migraine in a preliminary clinical study to determine whether this common headache disorder is associated with any abnormalities in cortical inhibitory mechanisms. Normal-appearing white matter and cortex of the occipital, frontal, and parietal lobes were examined with quantitative histologic techniques in two experimental designs. Results showed that, in contrast to findings in control subjects, there was no significant reduction in the number of parvalbumin-containing GABAergic neurons in the anterior insular cortex or somatosensory cortex of migraineurs. In contrast, there was a significant decrease in the number of calretinin-containing GABAergic neurons in the occipital and parietal cortices of migraineurs. These results suggest that there is cortical disinhibition in migraine, and support the hypothesis that this disorder is related to a 520fdb1ae7
