Diablo immortal news august 2020

We don't all know when Diablo Immortal is coming, but it's late 2020 as I write it and we still do not know the game release date. Back in March 2019, NetEase, a developer of mobile ARPG, said that the game was essentially ready and Blizzard hands, but we have not yet had a hint if we can see the game. In fact, we've gone so long without an update that we've wondered if the game has been canceled. But the game has not been cancelled, and we've received some updates this year. The development is ongoing: there was a new gameplay trailer for ChinaJoy in July (although it was slim in the new footage) and Blizzard itself put out we're still running diablo immortal post in August. The game is currently under internal testing, but Blizzard previously said it would be regional testing in the mid-2020s and the game will have pre-registration for early access to Google Play for months - neither of which has happened. What's up? Where's the game? The announcement of BlizzCon 2018 may not go the way Blizzard wanted, but all reports of the demo available were top notch. Even people who were quite skeptical like our own Dan O'Halloran enjoyed the demo and didn't feel like the game was all that far from release. When can we finally play this game ourselves? Probably not anytime soon. Why don't we get diablo's immortal release date? I assume that the global pandemic did not make getting the game ready for release easier, and the internal testing period for Diablo Immortal could last a really long time - perhaps longer than Blizzard intended. This is Blizzard's first really great foray into mobile gaming, and it's one that they'll likely feel a certain pressure to get right after problems with games like Warcraft 3 Reforged as well as how badly Diablo Immortal was obtained when it was announced in 2018. It is quite possible that without an arbitrary deadline to hit, Blizzard decided that they must take their time for this one. But we haven't heard much about the national game this year. The new ChinaJoy trailer was only slightly different from the original trailer released in 2018. And Blizzard's latest update really only told us that the game is internal testing. These rather thin updates are the most we've heard of Diablo Immortal since 2019 netease revenue call where they said the game was basically ready. But maybe Blizzard is looking for a bigger picture of release dates. We got our Diablo 4 announcement of BlizzCon 2019 - I know I was there, I even got to play a demo - and that game still deep in development, Immortal seems the next Diablo property Blizzard could hype. But if Blizzard really works on diablo series on Netflix or any other streaming service, may be part of the reason why we haven't got an Immortal release date yet - Blizzard can expect a tie-in with the media to help match the pieces of diablo narrative together. Or it could be that Warcraft's October Shadowlands release would steal immortal thunder and the franchise would be best off coming out later. But these are the only facts we can be sure of: the game has Blizzard hands, NetEase has probably done it, Blizzard tests it internally. We do not know what changes Blizzard may make, what issues the game may have, or why it has not even entered regional testing yet. Diablo Immortal will not be released in 2020 At this point, I do not think we are going to see Diablo Immortal release in 2020. It's not that I don't want a release, but looking at the news we've received from this game this year, the outlook is slim. Although we did get a little information about Chinajoy, the game was not mentioned in Gamescom and there is no BlizzCon 2020 event to give the game a splashy sendoff. It all unites to make me feel like a release before 2021 is highly unlikely. If Blizzard was going to release this game this year, shadowlands getting a big push in October, it would be very difficult. They should move to beta now. I just don't see that happening. Right now, all we can do is speculate. But at the end of this year, seeing the beta test seems unlikely and seeing the launch seems even less likely we hope to see Diablo Immortal 2021, but now all we can do is wait for more scraps of news from Blizzard.
