Pasteurized and lipolyzed transpyloric feeding tube placement for oral nutritional support in the intensive care unit. Transpyloric tube feeding is recommended for patients who require prolonged nutritional support. This study evaluated the feasibility of placing a completely bypassed, double-lumen, pediatric, metered-dose, self-retaining, nasogastric (TG) tube with or without lipolysis of the gastric content into the proximal stomach for oral nutritional support in critically ill patients. A 6- to 8-Fr TG tube was inserted into the stomach in five patients who were expected to require oral nutrition support for a prolonged period. Tubes were evaluated during and after placement for patency, ease of removal, and amount and composition of gastric contents. Follow-up chest roentgenograms were obtained to evaluate gastric distention. Placement of a 6-Fr TG tube was easy in all patients. A 5-Fr TG tube was placed in two patients, a 6-Fr TG tube in one patient, and a 6- to 8-Fr TG tube in two patients. Neither patient had a retained gastric tube. Examination of the gastric tube revealed that it was flush, and the gastric contents had lipolyzed. A nasogastric tube was successfully removed from the abdomen without difficulty and was not retained. Follow-up chest roentgenograms showed no evidence of gastric distention. Orogastric placement of the tube was successful in five of five patients with a TG tube without lipolysis. Lipolysis of the gastric content is a convenient alternative when TG tubes have to be placed in critically ill patients, and the risk of gastric aspiration with gastric distention and respiratory compromise is eliminated.
