The modern English word warrior comes from the 12th-century French word werreieor, which means the one who wages war. But the idea that a special class of people must fight on behalf of their tribes, cities or nations goes much further in history. The ancient Greek poet Homer, who composed his epic Iliad around the 8th century BC, celebrated the martial skill and ferocious bravery of the Trojan hero Hector, who defended his city and encountered Achilles in a struggle he was doomed by divine intervention to lose. Chinese general and philosopher Sun-Tzu of the 5th century BC wrote a military manual, The Art of War, in which he described both the tactical knowledge warriors needed, and the moral and spiritual principles that could lead to victory against enemies. Ancient Rome produced a class of professional military personnel, including Julius Caesar, who led the armies that built a powerful empire. This military lineage continues to the present, with the ranks of volunteer soldiers, pilots, marines, and sailors of the United States army, who are prepared to go to war in defense of their country and its allies. Announcement Of ancient cultures I needed a special kind of warriors because fighting a war was a complicated and difficult task, both practically and morally. 17th-century English philosopher Thomas Hobbes said humans first formed civilization for fear that without laws and authority, they would all kill each other. However, to preserve this order, civilized societies have also needed people capable of defending them from external enemies, as well as struggling to obtain the land or resources that societies needed. Ironically, to do their job, these special citizens have to get out of the normal rules of society and use violence -- often to kill. To compensate for this obvious contradiction, many societies not only train warriors to use combat skills, but indoctrinate them with elaborate codes of conduct that carefully detail when violence should be used and when it should not be used. In enlightened societies, warriors are also taught to follow international rules to curb cruelty and unnecessary murder, even when that means disobeying an order from a superior. Great warriors are often praised by society. We learn to admire them in part because our culture -songs, news stories by war correspondents, TELEVISION shows and films - teaches us how to do it, according to historian Andrew Huebner, author of The Warrior Image: Soldiers in American Culture from World War II to the Vietnam Era. Huebner says such media representations of military heroes focus on and identification with the sacrifices of those who serve in combat, rather than the cause for which they fight [source: Huebner]. But perhaps we also praise the warrior for the principles he represents. For example, in modern times, the term warrior has also taken on a non-military meaning, also referring to people who develop the same attributes necessary for war - preparation, discipline, loyalty, courage and willingness to take orders and work with others - and apply them to challenges in civilian life, from building a business or solving a social problem, to winning religious converts. The ancient warriors had no Instagram feeds or Twitter handles, they had the poets. The poets sang songs by ancient warriors, heroes and villains, and spread the news of their actions throughout. Homer is only responsible for most of the reputation of the characters of greek myth, and Homer was barely alone in his profession. Some ancient warriors took their names from a physical descriptor, not unlike the blackbeard pirate, while others were simply by a single name, as Sting, Cher or Prince. La most ancient warriors are known primarily for their specific actions. Theseus was known for dealing with the Minotaur, Hercules for his twelve works, Achilles for the War with Troy. Some ancient named warriors became so widely known, their stories and names became synonymous, as with Odysseus, whose name came to adorn its history, the Odyssey, and in turn became a word in itself. The site was irresistible: a large lot on a land finger protruding on Puget Sound by Whidbey Island, Washington, an hour's ferry and car ride from Seattle. A large sandy beach (unusual for the rocky coast of the area) was located and at the back it adjoined more than 10 acres of unspoiled wetlands, a regular destination for eagles, gulls and migratory birds. Helen and Ethan Bell jumped on the chance to buy the pristine property. For years Helen had been looting magazines for ideas and resources, so when it came time to plan, both she and Ethan had a clear idea of what they wanted, a casual beach hut that wouldn't be too big or imposing. Working with Seattle architect Robert Maloney and contractor Donald Heggens, they devised a plan for a small building complex—a main house, a guest house, a garage, and a cargo truck—surrounding a courtyard. This configuration allowed them to put only three bedrooms in the main house and provide a place for a central garden that would be protected from strong winds and salt water. We decided to create a house that has no identifiable style, a stick-framed coastal house that you can find in South Carolina, Maine or here in Washington, Maloney says. Everything was deliberately kept simple, clean and easy to care for because it is a second home. The interior layout of the first floor flows easily, with the kitchen opening to the living and dining areas. High vaulted ceilings adorn most rooms, and abundant French windows and doors invite sunlight and offer stunning views. The second floor consists of two bedrooms, a small library and a large balcony. Helen chose to paint almost everything white, including the ground floor floors (made of light spruce, which were finished with a heavy-duty paint designed for garage floors, which swears that it is easily kept clean moisture scrubbing). The choice of color improves the feeling of uninterrupted movement and makes the house feel light and informal. Borrowing touches from the traditional-style houses they love, the Bells incorporated many classic architectural elements into the house, house, wainscoting, and a deep coffered ceiling in the kitchen. White paint, however, prevents all these features from looking too formal. Outdoors, spacious decks on two levels go down to the beach, and, combined with the landscape, make it look like the house is nestled between the dunes. At one end of the deck, an exterior room is delineated by the family's exterior walls and dining rooms and a cantilever. Refugee from the wind and equipped with a fireplace and picnic table, this space gives the family front row seats to enjoy the sunset over Puget Sound while the fire avoids the cold of night. The courtyard, says landscape architect Lyle Grant, is a mixture of a formal structure and informal plantations. Helen wanted a short, cut of flowers, as well as plots for herbs and vegetables. Grant suggested one section for Oliver and another that would include a pleasant melange of perennials, annuals and perennial and deciduous shrubs. To organize the space, he devised a classic plan composed of these four plantation areas separated by gravel roads. In general, the scheme is an easy variety of beach-tolerant cottagey plants and flowers. Lavender and ornamental herbs are planted everywhere for your visual interest. The cutting garden is sketched in box wood, for definition, and full of flowers such as day lilies, dahlias and peonies. Herbs in this Mediterranean setting work well, and the shaded garden, added in a protected niche next to the house, houses plants that are not typically found by the sea, including camellias, oak leaf hydrangeas and Stewartia trees. By next year, all plantations should be well established, with grass scrub creating a nesting environment for birds. And one day, maybe when Oliver brings his own children here, little Douglas fir next to the house will be tall enough to be home to the alcid eagles.
