That's not what the situation is. The situation is we're flying with a much smaller jet and we're not taking into consideration how to make that better.

We're thinking about how to make it so we can put a payload in it, put another payload on it. How to make it so that if you're developing an upgrade of the jet to be able to change all of the sensors, all of the controls inside of the jet, in a very short time.

And a very short time is because the manufacturers of the industry, the jet manufacturers are setting up these teams that are testing this thing. These things are flying around, especially the high-performance stealth, high-end stealth jets. It's flying all around the world. And there are about a half-dozen different groups that have been flying these things. Abby Martin: All right, well, let's continue. We're going to continue this conversation, and we're going to talk about a future. But this is a very different conversation. It's the most dangerous conversation that we've ever had on the show. All right. We're going to continue this conversation next week. Watch the video version here. A modified gamma scintigraphy method for cerebral blood flow measurement in baboons. Modifications are described for a simplified technique to measure cerebral blood flow by noninvasive monitoring of the disappearance rate of (99m)Tc-HMPAO (hexamethylpropyleneamine oxime) from blood. This method does not require the use of animals with surgically prepared external carotid-caudal and internal jugular venous-carotid artery-caudal sinus shunts, which are essential for the direct measurement of cerebral blood flow using tritiated water. This method has been employed in baboons without using tracer doses of (99m)Tc-HMPAO, which require handling and disposal in a high radiation area. The simplified method described is technically less demanding, less expensive, and does not require the use of special safety precautions or radiation-monitoring devices.
