In the same vein as previously released randomizers, it provides an individual gaming experience, allowing you to randomize many things: Starter Pokemon Choices. The wild Pokemon you meet in grass, caves and other places. Pokemon that trainers use against you. Basic statistics, determining the potential of each Pokemon. Elementary types of each Pokemon. The abilities of each Pokemon, in games where they exist. The moves that Pokemon learn by gaining levels. The contents of each TM that you can teach Pokemon to give them extra moves (HM moves are not modified to make sure you can still beat the game) the ability of each Pokemon to learn every TM or HM move. Static Pokemon that you either give, fight on the other side, or are sold. The names of the coaches and the classes in which they belong. Moves are taught to move tutors, for games in which they are quite significant. Naturally, you can choose exactly what is randomized in your particular ROM. If randomizing things like Pokemon types is just too confusing or unenjoyable, randomization can be easily adapted to your specific needs. Why use this randomizer? It's universal. Each major series of Pokemon game released in the U.S. is supported, from red to Black2 and everything in between. You can easily create the same random game repeatedly. An important part of Pokemon is the competition, and racing your friends to complete a particular random Pokemon game can be a great experience. By sending a couple of snippets of text or a small file you can easily make sure that everyone has the exact same game to play with, without having to send around the ROM every time. It's thorough. A decent amount of attention to detail has been invested in this randomizer and so the pesky parts of the original games are unlikely to show up to the end. For example, random Pokemon trainers will not suddenly use the moves they were preordained for use in the original game - they will be completely subject to (randomized or not) movements that were given to them. There are small things he does to give you the best experience. When randomizing your ROM, you can apply a few minor tweaks that make the experience more enjoyable in an environment you're likely to be playing a randomized game in.
