Conversations tend to flow naturally for hours with people we've built relationships with. When it comes to our friends, family, or important people, we learn to best navigate conversations with the top people in our lives but with others, this doesn't always come naturally. Some people are simply more complicated to talk to or perhaps it's us who are shy when we're around unfamiliar people. It can be difficult to find the right things to say to someone we barely know even for 10 minutes. If you find it hard to talk to strangers, you're not alone and it's perfectly normal – many people face the very same dilemma that you do. For those who like to talk about the things that make the most sense to them, temporary musings, lives and relationships, (in-person we're talking to you, small talk can feel pretty dull and/or uncomfortable. We understand the struggle, which is why we have compiled these 12 secret hacks to help you always know what to say in conversation. Whenever you're stuck in monotonous chit chat, try on these simple hacks after asking some too generic questions like what's up? How are you? etc. to shake up the long clumsy pause. The easiest way to get someone to talk is to ask them about something they are passionate about; their goals, interests, favorite places, or someone they love. When people talk about topics they love, they can continue to make the conversation more natural. To find out what people are passionate about, ask questions like what someone does in their spare time, possible interests or goals. They can't open it all at once so, keep asking them questions related to it. We all tend this to zone out any dull conversation and open the window of our minds to a memory, idea, or a script. But if you are interested in keeping the conversation going, you must avoid let your mind drift and actually listen to the person who is talking. A smooth talker is often someone who remembers things about others and is low and we often learn about others through listening. When others are telling you about their family, work, etc. pay attention to what they are saying and instead say hmm..., ask related questions. The fastest way to link to a stranger is if the answer to this question is somewhat of your interest. Let's just assume you're asking about their favorite book? And the answer to that book is a song of ice and fire. Whoa! It's something you've read too. So now you can go hours and hours about discussing different characters, scenes, and authors. And the same thing happens with music, movies and TV shows. Well, the best part is that people feel quite comfortable discussing these things even with someone they don't know very well. Until now, we've put a lot of stress on asking interesting questions instead of generic questions. But these generic questions are always questions that act as a conversation starter. Whenever you meet a new person at the party, keep asking these general questions until you stumble upon something interesting. Do not stress too much about what to ask and what not. Just try to avoid too personal questions, that's all. And also, don't fret too much about putting words into sentences to make it either funny or profound. Be friendly, and that will work. The more you talk freely to them, the more open they will be to you. So even if they ask you about your job, instead of answering with it going well, let's add a little detail about how much you prefer to work for people in need or stressful accounting jobs. This way they may be able to relate and will tell you about their work issues too. This question may seem like a very general question like asking someone what they do these days is, but believe me, this question has a much stronger effect. And that's because we don't talk about important issues mainly as we're always interested in work, college, health but we somehow forget to ask that how emotional are you? What makes it hard for you? Are you tired of being too strong? What keeps you going? So when you a person about how your life is, it gives an incitively asking them to tell their inner truth. And the probability of them opening up to you will be more than those Question. To the key to a healthy conversation is that both individuals are actively involved in it. So when it's your turn to talk, and they ask you some questions about your last trip. It's okay if you tell them about your stay and the places you've visited and even if you have one or two interesting incidents that have taken place. But don't overdo it. If, in any case, you think pther people are getting bored with your part skipping conversations and asking them about their latest trip. You know to make them talk because, honestly, no one likes a self-absorbed person. To make small negotiations, you are supposed to make others a positive part of the conversation. So what better than asking them light questions about their past. Like where they were born or where they studied, the subjects they choose, etc. But remember not to ask too many personal questions. And if at any stage you feel that the person is a little reluctant to answer, just go back. Because making them feel uncomfortable is the last thing you want to do. With the constant rush of social media, there's always something new to talk about; trending hashtags on Twitter, new Videos on YouTube and any new memes on Facebook, etc. There's always something. So why not use these topics to start your left conversation again with strangers sitting next to you. Let's say you're asking about other people's interest, and it turns out it's racing cars, but unfortunately, that's not your domain name. So instead of pretending that you know about it and nodding, you go constantly; open about it. Say something like, Oh! Oh, that's what I don't know nothing about at all. This way you can move on to the next interest. Or you can also stick to this one and ask them to tell you the details about it for beginners. Small talk can be boring, but it can be turned into something a lot more interesting when you ask people about their opinions on a certain topic. It's like opening a gate for debate. Whenever you are having a debate on a particular topic, there will likely be someone who will keep an opinion opposite you. Understand that it is okay to keep different opinions because people are different. The opinion or morality you hold is because of the environment you've been putting up in, the lessons you've been taught as a child, the books you read, and the people you've met. But in no way, it would be similar for others to do so, instead of panicking and stepping back into the cymblem-silent phase. You can come up with ways to combat it by changing the topic gradually or questioning them about their place, etc. Each individual is an interesting book. So reserve judgments on them, try to learn a little more. We hope that next time you have to go to collect the you barely know; you don't find yourself in the corner but instead enjoy your time socializing and maybe even come out with a new friend or two!
