For example, Buddha never talked about suffering, and in Dukha, it is a fallen word that usually translates as suffering has much greater depth. Another problematic term, tanha translates as desire, among many others. Without taking this into account, a person will have a false understanding of what has been exposed in the sutta; (2) Knowing the social, historical, and cultural context of the time when sutta was delivered and written is also important for understanding the doctrine; (3) Understanding who is meant for the teaching, the psychological state of the person, and whether it applies to our situation. A non-specialist figure is not expected to have the same level of practice as a monk. Some teachings, such as contemplating 32 repulsive body parts or contemplating corpses, may even be counterproductive to some people; (4) The definition of what is symbolism and allegory and their understanding. Defining what is a doctrine that should not be seen as a simple allegory; (5) Interpret some claims, such as the speech of the Buddha, and if the suttas of different canons are compared and knowing the context of time we can conclude that a certain statement has hardly been said by Buddha, who is not according to the sphere of teaching, and it was probably some personal addition of the monks who wrote the sutta. In conclusion, there are suttas that if a beginner is going to read without having a base, will not understand, can even be left in disgust and move away from Buddhism because of a lack of understanding. It is not designed with this warning to intimidate people from not reading suttas, but rather to warn of some obstacles and the importance of learning, not just reading. Contact with the sutts is always important for a Buddhist. A skilled craftsman is an asset to the practitioner. Did you find any errors? Is there a link already available? Report an error.
