Unfortunately, she has a chronic illness that means that she has to be constantly on a drip. The drip is her life. She is hardly ever left alone. She lives in a house with her chronically sick mother and her elderly grandmother. Naina spends most of her time either sitting by the drip to feed her mother or sitting in her own room, where she spends the rest of her days. Her worst fear is that she is going to die. She can't function on her own and she feels she is trapped in her own life. Her only hope is that her mother will die. But she can't tell her mother that she is in fear of dying. Her mother would try to help her overcome her fear and reach a better place. The way that the movie portrays Naina is remarkable. She is trapped in her life and does not have control over anything. So when she learns that she is dying she simply wants to die. She was not born a teacher but she has never found anyone she is competent at being a teacher and she has never found a purpose in life. She is trapped. Initially, she does not want to believe that she is dying. She tries to believe that she is a victim and that her mother is her creator and she is helpless and Naina is doing everything to protect her mother. She feels the responsibility of protecting her mother. Her mother has to go to a hospital every day for the drip and since she is gone for more than eight hours a day, she is constantly worried about her mother. Naina starts making decisions that she does not like but which she thinks will help her mother. She thinks that her being an assistant will mean that she is less of a burden. However, she thinks that if she is not on the drip at least half the time, her mother will be able to hold on to life. The doctor does not want to admit that Naina has a serious disease and she gets suspicious about the doctor's motives and the way that he is treating her mother. She starts questioning the doctor and ultimately, she makes a decision that she should not be on the drip anymore. The doctor is angry at her. He is used to being able to do what he wants and force the patient to do what 520fdb1ae7
