Protein-rich diet decreases postprandial glycemic response: implications for diabetes prevention. The dietary protein-to-carbohydrate ratio has been shown to influence postprandial glycemic response. We studied the effect of a high-protein meal on the postprandial glycemic response. The study was conducted in three groups of eight healthy subjects. In a randomized design, subjects were assigned either a protein-rich meal (60% energy as protein, 15% as carbohydrate) or a carbohydrate-rich meal (10% energy as protein, 85% as carbohydrate) or a noncaloric placebo meal (maltodextrin). Intragastric and subcutaneous glucose infusion rates and concentrations of plasma glucose and insulin were determined. Compared with placebo, the carbohydrate-rich meal caused no change in plasma glucose but increased plasma insulin, while the protein-rich meal caused a significantly smaller rise in plasma insulin concentration. These results suggest that a high protein-to-carbohydrate ratio decreases the postprandial glycemic response. This finding may have implications for diabetes prevention.
