ISBN: ISBN 10: Footprint: For sale: Sixteen-year-old Nicola Sparks is set to plunge into her first season in London. A whirlwind of fashion activities awaits you, although catching a husband, usually the main object of the All Girls Season, is not among them. Because Nicola has already chosen him: a beautiful viscount with the name Lord Sebastian. Lord Sebastian Bartholomew is rich, engaging and debonair, even if the few moments so short that Nicola has spent with him have produced small discussions about poetry. Nicola is safe a proposal from San Sebastian would be a match made in heaven. Everything is fine, until the infuriated Nathaniel Sheridan begins to question the character of the Viscount. Nicola is Nathaniel's efforts to harass Lord Sebastian's sterile reputation will give nothing. But when she starts putting things together for herself, the truth that is revealed has as much to do with the Viscount as with Nicola's own heart. Inspiration When I was a teenager I saw the film Romancing the Stone, and knew at the same time that I wanted to be a historical romantic writer just like Joan Wilder (because I had to go to work in his pyjamas). I loved reading historical romances, especially those with humor in them, by authors like Johanna Lindsey and Amanda Quick. It's a dream come true to see my books on the same shelves as yours! Dear Extract Nana, I hope you have received the gifts I have sent you. The shawl is pure Chinese silk, and the pipe I sent for pudgy is handled with ivory! You don't have to worry about spending; I was able to use my monthly stipend. I stay with the Bartomeu-I explained in my last letter and they will not let me spend a penny with myself! Lord Farely insists on paying for everything. He's such a kind man. He is very interested in locomotives and the railway. He says that one day, the whole of England will be connected by rail, and that one could start in the morning in Brighton, and at the end of the day they are in Edinburgh! I found it a little hard to believe, as I'm sure you do, too, but that's what it says. Nicola stopped by in her letter writing to read about what she had already written. As he did so, he carefully mocked the blurred end of his pen. Nana was, of course, not her real grandmother. Nicola had no real grandparents, they were all brought in by the flu before she was born. Because her only remaining relative, Lord Renshaw, had had no interest or knowledge of raising a girl, Nicola had been raised, until she was old enough to go to school, by the wife of the carer of her father's estate, Beckwell Abbey. It was for this wife-and-her husband, whom Nicola affectionately referred to as Puddy -- that Nicola sought advice and comfort from her grandmother. Depending, as Nicola was, on the small income that local farmers supplied renting out many rolling fields of the abbey for their sheep to graze, Nana and Puddy lived modestly, but fine. But never as good as Nicola had been living for the past month. The Bartholomews, as it turned out, were as rich as Phillip Sheridan had declared . perhaps even richer. But what Phillip had not mentioned, as he could not have known, was that the Bartholomews were also generous, almost to a fault. Nicola needed to express only the slightest wish, and her wish was immediately granted. She had learned to bite exclamations about hats or trinkets in the many shops that she and Honoria frequented, because they were not herself the master of whatever she had admired. She couldn't allow these kinds of people to keep buying for her. especially because I had no way of returning the favor. On addition to that, Nicola didn't really need new outfits or hats. The need, in the form of her limited income, had forced her to become a qualified and creative seamstress. She had been taught to change an old dress with a new fleet or sleeves until it looked like she had just come straight from a Parisian clothing store. And she was almost as thin as any in town, having made many an elegant old-fashioned hood in the extreme with an artition addition of a silk rose here, or an artificial cherry there. Looking at her letter, Nicola wondered if she should add something about the God. It seemed that it might be a good idea, as it was entirely possible that Sebastian Bartholomew would play an important role in all their lives, if things kept as they had been. Having grown up almost completely protected from them, Nicola knew very little, it was true, about young men, but it seemed to her that Honoria's brother had been more attentive since he had come to stay. He escorted the girls almost everywhere, except when he wasn't busy with his own friends, who were very fond of gambling and horses, like most young men -- except perhaps Nathaniel Sheridan, who was too worried about managing his father's many estates ever to stop for a whistle-blower or bagatelle game. Even more excitingly, the God was always the first to ask Nicola for a dance on any ball she happened to attend. Sometimes she even secured two dances with her in one night. Three dances with a gentleman to whom she was not engaged, of course, would be scandalous, so it was not even a possibility. On these occasions, of course, Nicola's heart sang, and I couldn't believe there was a happier soul in London than her. It seemed incredible, but it seemed that he had actually achieved what he had done, which impressed the young Viscount Farnsworth-because this was the title of Lord Sebastian, which he would keep until his father died, and assumed the title of Earl of Farelly with his wit and charm. As she had done -- and quite without the help of any dust on her face -- she couldn't say, but she didn't think she could be mistaken for signs: the God admired her, at least a little. She assumed that her hair, which she wore up all the time now, with Martine's help, had helped. All Nicola needed to forever seal her happiness was for the God to propose marriage. If she didn't, when, when she had already decided she would say yes. But there was, in the back of his mind, a doubt that this proposal could actually materialize. At the same time, she wasn't rich. She had nothing but her very beautiful face and of acute fashion to recommend it. Handsome young men of wealth and importance rarely asked shameless girls like Nicola-even girls without sorrow for good and excellent education-to marry them. The love matches were well and good, but, as Madame had often reminded them, hunger is not pleasant. Young people who did not marry as their parents instructed them often found themselves cut off without a penny. And it was perfectly false that you could live in love alone. Love couldn't, after all, put bread on the table and meat in the pantry. But from the objections of the parents to a match between her and the God, at least, Nicola felt she was safe. Lord and Lady Farelly seemed prodigiously fond of her. Why, in the short time since she had come to live with them, they seemed to already think of her as a second daughter, including her in all their family conversations, and even occasionally dropping her formal address from her as Miss Sparks, and calling her Nicola. No, if Mr. Sebastian sees it in a position to propose to him, he could not foresee any difficulty from this quarter. But would it? Would you propose to a girl who was only pretty but not pretty? A girl with freckles on her nose, who had just been able to put her hair on? An orphan with only a little property in Northumberland and a broad knowledge of romantic poets? I had to. I just had to do it! Nicola felt it as surely as she felt that a woman's ochre of redhead was an abomination. Abomination.
